Right from the start of the Bill, we have all acknowledged that the climate of industrial relations in this country has been transformed in the past 10 or 15 years, partly because of legislation that has democratised the trade union movement. Given the consultation that has taken place to bring the Bill to the House, and if the evidence was available, it is surprising and a little unfortunate that such detailed new clauses have had to be introduced so late in the process. I am not saying that that is not justified, but it puts those of us who are trying genuinely to scrutinise legislation in a slightly invidious position.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) referred to the example of a company in which there is no animosity and in which the natural tendency of a manager who knows that a recognition debate is going on is to say "How's it going?" The wording gives the impression that that could become an offence. The legislation has just arrived, and we have not had time to test out how it could apply and whether it could lead to slightly silly litigation that gets in the way of good employment relations.

David Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman is drawing an important distinction. As a former trade union official who became chief executive of a small company, I remind him that the determining factor rests with the chief executive or the employer. I knew, when I spoke to an employee as an employer, as opposed to a trade union official, that I could intimidate them off the cuff. However, let me make this distinction: if the relationship between the employer and employee is good, there will never be a situation in which the employee takes the employer to task.

Malcolm Bruce: I agree entirely, but we are entitled as legislators to look at what the Bill says and how it might be applied. It has already gone through my mind that I doubt that anybody will want to go to law in a good business with a constructive atmosphere, although it may take only one malicious individual to cause damage. All that I am concerned about is ensuring that the measure is not sloppily drafted and that it means what it says and does not create unnecessary problems. I think that that is a perfectly fair role for us to play in the House.

I wish to repeat what I said in intervening on the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk about the orders, which the Minister said he would return to. The Minister made two points. The first was that further details would be brought before another place. I am afraid that that is a weary old comment. Even though we consult, we pass too many laws rather hurriedly at the end of the process, which is simply not a good way of making law. That is all that I am saying. Such a way of proceeding does not necessarily produce bad law, but it certainly does not help to produce good law; indeed, it is more likely to produce bad law, because proper consideration is not given.

[Malcolm Bruce]

The more particular point relates to new paragraphs 27C(2) and 119C(2) to schedule A1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, which both state:

"An order under this paragraph may . . .

(a) amend this Schedule;

(b) apply any provision of this Schedule with such modifications . . .

(c) confer functions on the CAC;

(d) make provisions about the arrangement and conduct of further ballots;

(e) include supplementary or incidental provisions;

(f) make different provision for different cases or circumstances."

A pretty substantial statutory instrument is being envisaged. As the Government have introduced the provision at such a late stage, it is reasonable to seek assurances. I welcome the Government's practice of publishing draft statutory instruments that can be scrutinised and debated by Select Committees and hon. Members, so that when the final secondary legislation comes before the House it will have been subjected to a form of preliminary scrutiny. We all agree that the weakness of the statutory instrument as it is proposed—of course, this is the case from the point of view of the House, not the Government—is that it is not amendable and that we can only vote yes or no. Given that the provision is being introduced late in the process and that it is fairly extensive, it is reasonable for us to ask the Government to give it further consideration.

I understand the Minister's response to new clause 2, but, having considered it, I find it hard to take issue with what is proposed. In dealing with intimidation, it points to the "employer . . . or worker", so it contains reference to that point. One of the essential things that we are trying to do—this is a classic position for those on the Liberal Democrat Benches—is to get the balance right, as the Minister himself also said was necessary. If I may say so, that is something on which my party has a contribution to make.

Jim Sheridan: Does the hon. Gentleman share the views of the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, who said that it was perfectly acceptable to tell an employee that attending a trade union meeting could affect their performance? Many of us on the Labour Benches have heard those chilling words before and then suffered the consequences.

Malcolm Bruce: I do not think that the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk made that remark, although he has not contradicted the hon. Gentleman. I do not accept such views, but I accept the comment that an employer is, by definition, in a different situation. Let us be clear. Historically, there have also been situations in which trade unionists and trade union activists have used intimidating processes and put pressure on people in other ways. The reality is that the faults have arisen on both sides, but the situation has improved enormously.

When we finish our proceedings on the Bill—we support it and are not changing our position—we should not introduce legislation that upsets that balance, especially so late in the process. I am saying not that the measures before us upset the balance, but that they raise in my mind some legitimate and proper concerns that we should address.

Mr. Tynan: My hon. Friend the Minister is to be congratulated on introducing the Government new clauses, which I think are a response to the discussion that took place in Committee. When we discussed intimidation in Committee, hon. Members in all parts of the House recognised that it was unacceptable. As the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) said, the balance has to be got right. At present, the employers have all the cards and all the opportunities to intimidate people if they so wish. Only a small minority of employers need to be dealt with on that basis.

I would like to make a point about definitions and to add to the request made for an explanation of the phrase "undue influence". I, too, would like the Minister to explain that term, but I would also like the Opposition spokesman to explain something. I tried to intervene on him in respect of new clause 2, which refers to circumstances in which "a union uses undue force or intimidating measures".

I would be interested to hear what "undue force" and "intimidating measures" are. I have found that when a union tries to win a ballot, it will do everything it possibly can to convince people. That is usually done in a sensible way and on the basis of argument. If there was intimidation by a trade union, hon. Members in all parts of the House would say that it was unacceptable.

I think that the balance must be got right, as has been said. In that respect, we must examine Government new clause 6 carefully, as there is a concern that it goes too far the other way and will create a situation in which the union will be unduly punished without having been involved in intimidation. I ask the Minister to look at that point.

Mr. Djanogly: Having heard the debate thus far, my opinion is that a lot more work needs to be done on the new clauses in terms of their form and purpose. That view comes from having heard contributions from all parts of the House. I hope that the Minister will take that point away when the Bill heads to the Lords and think about it further.

I wish to speak in support of new clause 2. There is more sense in the four lines of that new clause than in the four pages taken up by the Government's equivalents—new clauses 6 and 7.

Mr. Tynan: If the hon. Gentleman believes that there is more sense in the four lines of new clause 2 than in the other provisions, will he explain the meaning of "undue force or intimidating measures"?

Mr. Djanogly: The Minister himself gave the straightforward example of intimidatory visits to people's homes. That is a good example, and I accept it.

The point about new clause 2 is that it does not deal with all aspects of work. It is very specific about the recognition procedure, and it applies only during the period when it is under way. Rather than dealing with a range of areas and issues, it is again specific about undue force and intimidation. As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) said, it is fair and concentrates on not only the company, but the workers, and is therefore balanced across the workplace.

7.30 pm

Importantly, the remedy introduced by new clause 2 is simple and does not relate to criminal or civil damages. I can see the complications for the Minister, but I still say that it is unacceptable not to introduce remedies. If new clause 2 bites, it is a declaration that the recognition procedure has ended, which is a simple, straightforward way to deal with the issue.

In Committee and during today's debate, certain hon. Members have implied that unions never use violent or intimidatory behaviour, but the behaviour of certain unions over past years has shown that, if anything, militancy is again starting to increase dramatically. There were, for example, suggestions that retained firefighters were intimidated during the miners' strike. /Interruption./ I mean the fire strike. Wildcat, unofficial strikes have occurred at, for example, British Airways and the Post Office. The climate of industrial relations has changed over the past year, but few people would say that it has changed for the better. A new generation of union leaders has come to the fore, and they are, perhaps, less conducive to the Government's way of thinking than their predecessors.

John McDonnell: British Airways headquarters is in my constituency, as is Heathrow. The unofficial action at Heathrow was voluntary action in which employees left their workplaces without any union policy or directive. Can the hon. Gentleman provide me with any evidence of intimidation, because none has been reported?

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman did not hear where I was coming from. The climate has changed dramatically, and I gave the Heathrow case as an example. It is bizarre that, despite 65 pieces of employment and union legislation, the unions are not grateful, but the more they get, the more they seem to retreat into militancy, which must create a conundrum for the Government.

Jim Sheridan: On the Minister's example of union intimidation, I should be interested to hear what steps, if any, the trade unions took to sort out that business. Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the question of intimidation is enshrined in most, if not all, trade union rulebooks? There is ample evidence of members or potential members of trade unions being disciplined for taking any intimidatory action whatsoever.

Mr. Djanogly: I have given a couple of examples, and I have some more, but they can wait—the GMB comes to mind.

I want to address the Government new clauses, and in particular new clauses 6 and 7, which are extremely complicated. My particular concern is that new clauses 6 and 7 cover not only intimidation, but the effect of intimidation. If there has been intimidation but it does not affect the ballot, it will be ignored by the new clauses, which is conceptually wrong. Indeed, there should be disincentives to intimidation, and I cannot see how disincentives can be introduced unless intimidation has negative consequences.

The second main point, which has been addressed previously, is that the Bill does not contain any remedies for intimidation, and I do not see how we can examine the effect of one without the other. Will the Minister at least clarify what the Government are thinking? Is the object to invalidate the ballot, not to allow the person or union that is doing the intimidation the chance to have a re-ballot or to punish the person who is doing the intimidation? Will the Government go down civil or criminal lines of remedy?

It is particularly unfortunate that new clauses 5 and 8 were tabled towards the end of last week, because they contain totally new concepts. The Government have at least said that they accept in principle the idea of an intimidation clause, but new clauses 5 and 8 have come out of the blue. The Minister should tell us why those new clauses have been introduced, because I can see no reason for them.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The debate has been interesting, and it clearly sets out the differences between the parties' attitudes towards employment relations and industrial relations. Intimidation, whether it is from unions or employers, will not be tolerated and we do not want to see it. As on Second Reading, my hon. Friends have exposed cases of intimidation, but Opposition Members have failed to come up with details of unions behaving badly.

The example that I gave of a union visiting workers' homes was raised with the Government by the CBI, which provided anecdotal evidence. It said that it could back up that claim, and we wait to see whether it can. The unions have given evidence to me and to the publication in the Library, which is available if hon. Members want to pick it up.

Mr. Tynan: Will my hon. Friend indicate the volume of evidence from the trade union against the volume of evidence from the CBI? I would be particularly interested to know what action was taken on intimidation in someone's home, which, as far as I am concerned, is a criminal offence, and I would have thought that criminal charges would have been brought.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, whose background makes him well versed in such matters. I do not want to be drawn down the line of who did what, because intimidation from either side is unacceptable.

On giving notice of the new clauses, my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and other hon. Members were in Committee when I said that the Government would introduce new clauses on intimidation and that the matter would be complex. As the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) says, we are trying to achieve a new attitude towards employment relations in the UK, and I think that he accepts that the Bill goes a long way to doing that. We are trying to move away from the existing adversarial culture to a culture in which people work together and understand the requirements of business. The trade unions play an increasingly large part in that process, which is evidenced by the number of FTSE 100 companies that are union organised, so the unions are generally a force for good.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

On union recognition procedure, we would initially like to see more voluntary agreements. So far, there have been more than 1,000 voluntary agreements, and it is a step in the right direction when employers and employees come together and go down the voluntary route. The statutory procedure covers situations in which that cannot happen, and is included as a minimum standard. It is reasonable to expect and accept that the Government's role should be to facilitate the smooth running of the statutory procedure, which is why I have said throughout that we must examine intimidation.

In response to my opening remarks, the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) said that the Government new clauses are pretty reasonable, but then he told us why they are unreasonable, and he did not make the case.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): Scrutiny.

Mr. Sutcliffe: It seems to me that the spirit of scrutiny in Committee is different from the spirit of scrutiny on the Floor of the House—perhaps that is because of this environment.

Mr. Djanogly: My hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) was not on the Committee.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman says that his hon. Friend was not there. I would expect the Front Bench spokesperson to read about how the Committee developed and learn from interventions on both sides of the House about where we are going with employment relations and the new attitude that we are trying to achieve. As I said in response to the hon. Member for Gordon, the key purpose is to stop intimidation, whether on the union side or the employer side.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk asked whether an employer can be penalised if he takes action against a worker for attending a meeting organised by the union at a time when he should be working. When the union and the employer make an access agreement, they will set out how many meetings should take place, when and where they should take place, how long they will last and which workers are entitled to attend which meetings. The new clause makes it clear that an employer can be penalised only if he takes action against a worker for attending a meeting that that worker was entitled to attend. The CAC would have a role in stopping frivolous cases and would consider the circumstances and the reasonableness of the situation, but initially the union and the employer would set out what meetings should take place.

I was asked why an employer should not be allowed to attend a meeting with his staff held on his premises during working hours, because surely he has such a right. In many cases, unions are happy for employers to attend access meetings. Indeed, the code of practice on access makes it clear that, where possible, joint meetings can be beneficial. However, we must accept that in some cases workers will not want their employer to know that they support a union's campaign. They might not even want their employer to know that they are going along to a meeting to find out about recognition. They may fear that their employer will brand them as disloyal if they do so, and may be afraid to ask the questions that they really want answered if the employer is there. Unfortunately, the evidence is that on occasion anti-union employers victimise union members and supporters. That is why it is important that meetings between the union and the workers in the bargaining unit should be private.

David Hamilton: Within that, there is a recognition that not employers, but management, attend union meetings along with workers because they are part of the structure. It is up to the local branch of the union to determine what is right. There are many thousands of cases where senior management attend meetings with the workers because they are part of that union.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. In fact, I would advocate that, because that is where the case can be put freely as to the union's campaigning activities and the employer's view of those activities. It is likely that that relationship exists in most go-ahead companies that look to the future. Another crucial part of the Bill is the information and consultation directive, which opens up the opportunities for dialogue to take place and moves away from the adversarial situation.

The hon. Member for Gordon suggested that surely it is okay for the employer to ask how a meeting went. Clearly it is, if his question is reasonable. If he says, "Did the meeting go well?", that is acceptable and there is no problem, but he may go further to ask for the names of the workers who were there and details of how the meeting went. The CAC would question the motivation behind that.

I was asked to explain the definition of "undue influence." Undue influence is a concept borrowed from the Representation of the People Act 1983. It includes: the use of, or threat to use, force, violence or restraint; the infliction of, or threat to inflict, injury, damage, harm or loss; and the impediment of the free exercise of the vote by fraudulent device or contrivance. The term is designed to pick up a range of behaviours from violence and threats of violence to libellous statements. Whether a particular action constitutes undue influence will depend a great deal on the circumstances and manner in which it was taken and whether it was demonstrably intended to influence the ballot. The Government intend to bring forward a code of practice following consultation with interested parties to provide clear guidance to all the parties involved.

We have been very conscious of the need to ensure that the jurisdictions of the CAC and the employment tribunal should remain separate. That is why we took care to ensure that the question that each court will have to consider is different. If a worker suffers detriment or dismissal for supporting or opposing recognition, he or she may seek individual redress at the employment tribunal. The union may seek collective redress from the CAC if that dismissal or detriment changed or was likely to change voting behaviours.

We intend to consult in detail on sanctions. Consultation is the whole basis of this and previous Bills. We have a good reputation with employers and trade unions in terms of taking that approach. I accept that there is a fear that we have not gone through the full process, but we have tried to do so on all these matters. We propose adopting a structure that is very similar to that already in place for breaches of a union's access duties. Where the CAC finds that a complaint is well-founded, it will be able to issue an order against the guilty party that they should desist from the unfair practice in question and take steps to remedy the harm done. For example, they may be ordered to repudiate an earlier statement or to restore to a worker any loss incurred through a detriment. Once the CAC has issued a remedial order, if that party subsequently breaches the remedial order or commits another unfair practice, the CAC can issue a second sanction. If the employer is at fault, that second sanction, as for access, will be that the union is automatically recognised. If the union is at fault, the sanction will be that the union's application fails—that is the same sort of sanction that applies for other detriment. I believe that we are acting in a proper and responsible manner in relation to those few times when intimidation takes place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) asked us to go further—of course, we keep such matters under review—but generally welcomed our proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South asked for the evidence on either side, and I hope that I explained what is being achieved.

The performance of the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) is ever consistent in that in most cases, unfortunately, he sees only one side of the argument. New clause 2 is not balanced—it applies only to the employer side, and even it is weak in terms of the definition of available sanctions.

Hon. Members will be aware that the Joint Committee scrutinises statutory instruments. I will try to give as much notice as possible in that respect, as I have throughout the passage of the Bill. I hope that hon. Members accept my assurances that when they are available they will have the opportunity to look at them.

This has been a good debate. Intimidation is wrong in whatever form it appears. The new clauses represent a balanced set of measures that meet the requirement of telling employers or unions who want to use underhand tactics that that is inappropriate. I commend the new clauses to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 6

UNFAIR PRACTICES IN RELATION TO RECOGNITION BALLOTS

'After paragraph 27 of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act insert—

"27A (1) Each of the parties informed by the CAC under paragraph 25(9) must refrain from using any unfair practice.

(2) A party uses an unfair practice if, with a view to influencing the result of the ballot, the party—

(a) offers anything to a worker entitled to vote in the ballot in return for the worker's agreement to vote in a particular way or to abstain from voting,

(b) coerces or attempts to coerce a worker entitled to vote in the ballot to disclose—

(i) whether he intends to vote or to abstain from voting in the ballot, or

(ii) how he intends to vote, or how he has voted, in the ballot,

(c) dismisses or threatens to dismiss a worker,

(d) takes or threatens to take disciplinary action against a worker,

(e) subjects or threatens to subject a worker to any other detriment, or

(f) uses or attempts to use undue influence on a worker entitled to vote in the ballot.

(3) The duty imposed by this paragraph does not confer any rights on a worker; but that does not affect any other right which a worker may have.

(4) Each of the following powers shall be taken to include power to issue Codes of Practice about unfair practices for the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) the power of ACAS under section 199(1);

27B (1) A party may complain to the CAC that another party has failed to comply with paragraph 27A.

(2) A complaint under sub-paragraph (1) must be made on or before the first working day after—

(a) the date of the ballot, or

(b) if the ballot is held on more than one day, the last date on which votes can be cast in the ballot.

(3) Within the decision period the CAC must decide whether the complaint is well-founded.

(4) A complaint is well-founded if—

(a) the CAC finds that the party complained against used an unfair practice, and

(b) the CAC is satisfied that the use of that practice changed or was likely to change, in the case of a worker entitled to vote in the ballot—

(i) his intention to vote or to abstain from voting,

(ii) his intention to vote in a particular way, or

(iii) how he voted.

(5) The decision period is—

(a) the period of 10 working days starting with the day after that on which the complaint under sub-paragraph (1) was received by the CAC, or

(b) such longer period (so starting) as the CAC may specify to the parties by a notice containing reasons for the extension.

(6) If, at the beginning of the decision period, the ballot has not begun, the CAC may by notice to the parties and the qualified independent person postpone the date on which it is to begin until a date which falls after the end of the decision period.

27C (1) The Secretary of State may by order make provision about the consequences of a decision that a complaint under paragraph 27B is well-founded.

(2) An order under this paragraph may, in particular—

(a) amend this Schedule;

(b) apply any provision of this Schedule with such modifications as may be specified in the order;

(c) confer functions on the CAC;

(d) make provision about the arrangement and conduct of further ballots;

(e) include supplementary or incidental provisions;

(f) make different provision for different cases or circumstances.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

(3) An order under this paragraph shall be made by statutory instrument.

(4) No such order shall be made unless a draft of it has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.".'.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 7

Unfair Practices in Relation to Derecognition Ballots

'After paragraph 119 of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act insert—

"119A<th>(1) Each of the parties informed by the CAC under paragraph 117(11) must refrain from using any unfair practice.

(2) A party uses an unfair practice if, with a view to influencing the result of the ballot, the party—

(a) offers anything to a worker entitled to vote in the ballot in return for the worker's agreement to vote in a particular way or to abstain from voting,

(b) coerces or attempts to coerce a worker entitled to vote in the ballot to disclose—

(i) whether he intends to vote or to abstain from voting in the ballot, or

(ii) how he intends to vote, or how he has voted, in the ballot,

(c) dismisses or threatens to dismiss a worker,

(d) takes or threatens to take disciplinary action against a worker,

(e) subjects or threatens to subject a worker to any other detriment, or

(f) uses or attempts to use undue influence on a worker entitled to vote in the ballot.

(3) The duty imposed by this paragraph does not confer any rights on a worker; but that does not affect any other right which a worker may have.

(4) Each of the following powers shall be taken to include power to issue Codes of Practice about unfair practices for the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) the power of ACAS under section 199(1);

119B (1) A party may complain to the CAC that another party has failed to comply with paragraph 119A.

(2) A complaint under sub-paragraph (1) must be made on or before the first working day after—

(a) the date of the ballot, or

(b) if the ballot is held on more than one day, the last date on which votes can be cast in the ballot.

(3) Within the decision period the CAC must decide whether the complaint is well-founded.

(4) A complaint is well-founded if—

(a) the CAC finds that the party complained against used an unfair practice, and

(b) the CAC is satisfied that the use of that practice changed or was likely to change, in the case of a worker entitled to vote in the ballot—

(i) his intention to vote or to abstain from voting,

(ii) his intention to vote in a particular way, or

(iii) how he voted.

(5) The decision period is—

(a) the period of 10 working days starting with the day after that on which the complaint under sub-paragraph (1) was received by the CAC, or

(b) such longer period (so starting) as the CAC may specify to the parties by a notice containing reasons for the extension.

(6) If, at the beginning of the decision period, the ballot has not begun, the CAC may by notice to the parties and the qualified independent person postpone the date on which it is to begin until a date which falls after the end of the decision period.

119C (1) The Secretary of State may by order make provision about the consequences of a decision that a complaint under paragraph 119B is well-founded.

(2) An order under this paragraph may, in particular—

(a) amend this Schedule;

(b) apply any provision of this Schedule with such modifications as may be specified in the order;

(c) confer functions on the CAC;

(d) make provision about the arrangement and conduct of further ballots;

(e) include supplementary or incidental provisions;

(4) No such order shall be made unless a draft of it has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.".'.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 8

Unfair Practices: Power to Make Provision About Periods Before Notice of Ballot

'After paragraph 166A of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act (which is inserted by section 12) insert—

"166B (1) The Secretary of State may by order provide that, during any period beginning and ending with the occurrence of specified events, employers and unions to which the order applies are prohibited from using such practices as are specified as unfair practices in relation to an application under this Schedule of a specified description.

(2) An order under this paragraph may make provision about the consequences of a contravention of any prohibition imposed by the order (including provision modifying the effect of any provision of this Schedule in the event of such a contravention).

(4) An order under this paragraph may contain provision extending for the purposes of the order either or both of the following powers to issue Codes of Practice—

(a) the power of ACAS under section 199(1);

(5) An order under this paragraph may—

(a) include supplementary or incidental provisions (including provision amending this Schedule), and

(b) make different provision for different cases or circumstances.

(7) No such order shall be made unless a draft of it has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(8) In this paragraph "specified" means specified in an order under this paragraph.".'.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

Dignity at Work

'(1) Every employee shall have the right to dignity at work, and if the terms of the contract under which a person is employed do not include that right they shall be deemed to include it.

(2) An employer commits a breach of the right to dignity at work of an employee if, during his employment with the employer, that employee suffers harassment or bullying or any act, omission or conduct which causes him to be alarmed or distressed, including (but not limited to) any of the following—

(a) behaviour on more than one occasion which is offensive, abusive, malicious, insulting or intimidating;

(b) unjustified criticism on more than one occasion;

(c) punishment imposed without reasonable justification;

(d) changes in the duties or responsibilities of the employee to the employee's detriment without reasonable justification.

(3) Every employer shall provide a written Dignity at Work Policy outlining each employee's right to dignity at work, which must include the following—

(a) an explanation of the statutory right of all employees to dignity at work and a statement that breaches of that right will not be tolerated;

(b) examples of the types of behaviour which do not conform with the right to dignity at work and of conduct which may lead to disciplinary action;

(c) a clear statement of the procedure for bringing complaints and the manner in which they will be dealt with, which must include a commitment that complaints of a breach of the right to dignity at work will be taken seriously, investigated objectively and dealt with in confidence and must allow the complainant to be represented by a representative of his choice at all stages;

(d) designation of a competent person to whom complaints should be made and who shall fulfil the functions allotted to the competent person by this Act;

(e) a clear statement of the disciplinary procedure to be followed against employees who infringe the Policy, which statement shall comply with the provisions of the ACAS Code of Practice on Disciplinary Practice and Procedures in Employment (1977);

(f) details (including names and contact telephone numbers) of designated persons available to counsel, assist and advise individuals bringing complaints or who are the subject of complaints;

(g) arrangements for training in the Policy all those occupying any position of managerial authority, and all employees of the Policy;

(h) annual monitoring of the operation of the Policy, to be reported to senior management, and to include a summary of all complaints made under the Policy (with names of complaints kept confidential unless the complainant agrees otherwise); and

(i) arrangements for consultation with trade union and safety representatives on the operation of the Policy, its implementation and any revision of the Policy in the light of its operation in practice.'.—[Valerie Davey.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The need for the Government to be more proactive in promoting and ensuring dignity at work for all employees at every level has been reiterated from the Back Benches of this Chamber and the House of Lords since at least 1996. I am pleased to have the opportunity briefly to consider new clause 1 and raise again the serious anxiety about the widespread nature of bullying in the workplace.

All Members of Parliament must know through their surgeries of cases of constituents experiencing bullying at work and being unable to voice that experience and seek a resolution. When we first heard about those often desperate cases, most of us were unaware of the scale of the problem. In November 2001, the Manchester school of management and the university of Manchester institute of science and technology published the report entitled, "Destructive Conflict and Bullying at Work". Five thousand people in 70 workplaces responded to the survey, which showed that one in 10 people—10 per cent.—had experienced bullying in the previous six months and that one in four—25 per cent.—had experienced bullying in the previous five years.

Subsequent evidence from trade unions confirmed that, despite years of campaigning against bullying, it remains a persistent and extensive problem. I want to identify and thank especially Amicus-MSF and Chris Ball, the national secretary, for persistently bringing the matter back to public attention, for producing good material for the use of members and officers and for drafting policies for employers and organisations. That experience led to the union concluding:

"The size of the problem cannot be overstated."

Amicus, and the Andrea Adams Trust, which is the only charity that responds to the counselling needs of those who have been bullied, encouraged the all-party dignity at work group to seek statutory action. I want to put on record my appreciation of the work of both organisations.

Further, more recent evidence has come in response to the new clause from the Royal College of Nursing, which offers its support and reports that its "Working well" survey showed that, in 2002, one in six nurses had been bullied in the workplace. It wants "additional protection for employees and redress for those who suffer bullying in the workplace."

Until last week, the Government's response on each occasion had been concerned words but limited action.

In response, dare I say it, to the new clause, which I tabled only a fortnight ago, the reaction was almost instantaneous and remarkably proactive. I offer my sincere congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on her announcement last week that, together with Amicus, the Government will launch the world's largest project to stamp out bullying and discrimination at work.

Alongside the need to support individuals, the Government have recognised that some 5 million people are affected, that 13.5 million working days are lost through stress and that the cost to the economy is £4 billion every year. The project has been launched to provide supportive advice and training to organisations that are trying to tackle bullying, train employees as counsellors, devise and promote a voluntary charter on dignity at work, promote examples of excellent employers in the United Kingdom and produce a benchmark that enables organisations to measure their success in achieving dignity at work and a "ban bullying" pack. The Government are working initially with Amicus and 10 leading employers, including British Aerospace, Royal Mail, Legal and General and British Telecommunications.

Although I understand that another 180 employers will join the project in the autumn, it is voluntary. However, it is far-reaching and extensive. The partnership with Amicus means that great experience will be brought to it, and that will be invaluable.

I remind the Government that other European countries have followed the legislative route and I hope that the project will be compared with the work in other countries. However, in the light of what the Government have produced and are doing, I would seek to withdraw the new clause on the understanding—and with an assurance—from the Minister that the project will be monitored and that, should good practice not prove as infectious as we all hope, the Government will reconsider the possibility of legislation and revisit the new clause or a similar provision later.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady cannot move and withdraw the clause in the same speech. I have to take it that she is moving the clause in the speech. We can then put the Question, on which the Minister and perhaps other hon. Members may wish to comment. Has the hon. Lady concluded her speech?

Valerie Davey: May I simply say that I am minded to withdraw the new clause and thank you for your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): It may not have been in order for the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) to mention at this stage her intention to withdraw the new clause, but since she has expressed it, I welcome it. Although I entirely agree with her sentiments and intentions, I disagree with the idea that passing further legislation will achieve them. The new clause is too prescriptive. Clearly, I do not have to make that argument because she acknowledges its validity.

New clause 1 would place an enormous burden on employers and employees to understand what constitutes a dignity at work policy and the way in which it would be enforced. That applies especially to a small workplace in a small or medium-sized firm that does not employ many human resources people. It cannot be good for industry to employ more people to deal with further regulations than it does to manufacture goods and services. Business and industry should be about the latter, not keeping to the letter of complicated laws.

I commend the hon. Lady for presenting the matter for discussion in the House and drawing it to the Minister's attention. The thrust of her comments is right. She has outlined the problem well but, unfortunately, new clause 1 is not the solution—would that it were. If the solution to the enormous problem that she described was passing such a law, we would all be pleased. Employers and employees alike would be pleased if we could eradicate the dreadful problem of bullying by merely writing something in statute.

Most employers want to be good employers and most employees want to be good employees because it is far preferable if everybody gets on well. Employers want to encourage their employees by being good employers because that is how to get the best out of their work force. It is as simple as that.

The hon. Lady was right to talk about dignity. How terribly undignified, therefore, that many people heard last week on radio and television that they would be made redundant. On Second Reading, the Secretary of State said:

"I am not prepared to have our workers hear on the radio that they will lose their jobs or find that they have already lost their jobs through a text message."—[Official Report, 14 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 821.]

So it is not all right for workers to suffer the indignity of hearing about the loss of their job by text message or on the radio or television, but it is all right if they hear it in the Budget. That is hardly a dignified way for the Government to treat large parts of their work force. If the Government backed their words with actions, many of the problems that we have been discussing throughout the passage of the Bill could be eradicated immediately.

It would be bad jurisprudence to pass new clause 1 into law, as it would be difficult to enforce. It is bad in principle to make laws that cannot be enforced and would be unclear. However, I join the hon. Lady in asking the Government to take seriously the problem that she outlined, which we would all like solved.

8 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) for tabling the new clause and for commending the Government's decisions over the last couple of weeks to work with the trade union Amicus on bullying. I agreed with a great deal of what the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) had to say, but if she is so keen on information and consultation, she will have explain to employees why her party will vote against the principles and proposals surrounding those issues later this evening. I am happy to give my hon. Friend the assurance that she seeks, and I ask her to withdraw her new clause.

Valerie Davey: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 2

INTIMIDATION

'After paragraph 51 of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act insert—

New Clause 3

APPEALS

'After paragraph 171 of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act insert—

"Appeals

171A Any of a union or a company or a relevant worker may appeal against any decision of the CAC to the High Court."'.'—[Mr. Bellingham.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Bellingham: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The only route of appeal from the Central Arbitration Committee is judicial review. My argument is simple and I shall not go into great detail: surely there is a need to build a simple mechanism into statute to allow appeal to the High Court. After all, an appeal to the High Court can be made from the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

One of my concerns is that the CAC is being asked to do more and more. With the inclusion in UK law of the EU information and consultation directive, there will be many more referrals to the CAC. I take the view, as do my hon. Friends, that more protection should be given to employers—and, indeed, employees and trade unions alike—in taking appeals to the High Court. I appreciate that things are improving, but I looked at some CAC cases from the past few years and I have to say that often the CAC does not spell out its decisions clearly or comprehensively.

On a number of occasions, all that the CAC has said is:

"In our industrial relations experience, this is our decision".

If we are not to have a right of appeal to the High Court, the Minister should certainly ask the CAC to be much clearer and to spell out in much more detail the background to and reasoning behind its decisions. I ask him to consider the new clause carefully.

Mr. Djanogly: I support the new clause, which would give unions—as well as all companies and all workers for that matter—the right to take an appeal against a CAC decision to the High Court. The workings of statutory recognition are complex and the procedures, as we have deduced over the past two months, can be complicated.

In deciding between the parties, the CAC sometimes has to make value judgments. I accept that the CAC is a worthy body and that it normally gets it right, but in those less frequent examples where one side is not happy with the decision—presumably in an industrial conflict—there should be a right of appeal.

In Committee, the Minister said that the CAC annual report notes that it has a satisfaction rating of 80 per cent. That is borne out in the report, which also notes that the response rate to the survey was only 40 per cent. In considering the judicial powers of the CAC, the people consulted might not want to go too public on their attitudes towards it, because it could judge them. Does the Minister know whether the CAC or an independent third party collected that data? That would be relevant to our consideration of whether an appeal would be fair. From what my hon. Friend has said, and from the statistics as given, such an appeal would be right.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful for the hon. Gentlemen's contributions to the debate.

As the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) explained, the new clause concerns whether there should be a mechanism for appeals against decisions of the Central Arbitration Committee in addition to the possibility of seeking a judicial review on any such decision. While in many areas of law it is useful to have a right of appeal to a higher authority when one party feels aggrieved about a court's decision, the Government think that it would be inappropriate in this case, in which there are statutory recognition procedures. The CAC must make a large number of judgments in the course of its consideration of an application. An additional right of appeal against individual decisions of the CAC would introduce serious delays into the process, particularly if it had to be halted until the appeal was heard. It would encourage legalism and the type of legal wrangling that undermined recognition procedures in the 1970s. Such delays are not neutral and in most cases favour the employer.

Most importantly, the CAC is a specialist body operating in a specialist area, as hon. Members have accepted. Its decisions often turn on the application of its members' industrial relations expertise and experience. No appeal court—including the High Court—could match that. That view was judicially endorsed in both the High Court and Court of Appeal in the Kwik-Fit judicial review. In the High Court, Mr. Justice Elias stated that "courts do not have the relevant expertise, nor is it desirable that these procedures should become a happy hunting ground for lawyers."

In the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Buxton agreed with this statement and added that

"the CAC was intended by Parliament to be a decision making body in a specialist area that is not suitable for the intervention of the courts."

Of course, the CAC's decisions can be challenged through judicial review. There have been only six applications for judicial review, four of which proceeded to a full review. In only two of those cases was the CAC found to have acted improperly in any way. The outcome of those few cases demonstrates that the CAC has used sound judgment in interpreting the extent and nature of its powers.

In addition, the amendment is defective in that it refers to the "company" not the "employer". It thereby ensures that employers that are not companies have no right of appeal. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) asked about the response rate to the survey on the CAC. Unless I receive some in-flight information, I cannot give him that answer now, but I will write to him in due course—[Interruption.] I think that the CAC has its own information, but I will clarify that, as he also asked that question in Committee.

The new clause would damage the smooth functioning of the recognition procedure for little discernible benefit, and is also defective. I hope that I have answered the hon. Gentleman's concerns and that he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful for the Minister for those remarks. In his customary charming way, he has explained why he does not like the amendment and feels that it is technically undesirable. I forgot to declare my interest as a barrister—he mentioned a happy hunting ground for lawyers, and I take on board his point. I reject his criticism of the High Court, which is made up of a large number of judges with huge expertise. In the light of what the Minister said, however, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

RIGHT TO STRIKE

'For subsection (2) of section 221 of the 1992 Act (restrictions on grant of injunctions and interdicts) substitute—

"(2) No injunction or interdict shall be granted to restrain exercise of the right to strike by a trade union or any workers.".'.—[John McDonnell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

John McDonnell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 11—Dismissal in connection with participation in official industrial action—

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

'(1) Section 238A of the 1992 Act (dismissal in connection with participation in official industrial action) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1) for "employee" substitute "worker".

(3) For subsections (2) to (8) substitute—

"(2) For the purposes of subsection (1) above a worker takes protected industrial action if he reasonably believes he is so doing.

(3) The obligations on the worker to work and on the employer to give consideration therefore under the contract under which a worker works shall be suspended by operation of law for that period during which the worker takes protected industrial action and shall in no circumstances be or be regarded as broken by reason of his taking protected industrial action.

(4) The Secretary of State shall make regulations which shall apply to deal with the consequences of suspension of contracts in accordance with subsection (3) so as to protect the various interests of workers and employers and in particular to ensure the preservation of the contract and the restoration of the obligations thereunder when the protected industrial action concludes.

(5) Loss of pay during industrial action (whether protected or not) shall never be greater than the sum which the worker would have earned had he not taken the industrial action.".'.

'(1) The 1992 Act is amended as follows.

(2) Before section 219 (but after the cross-heading immediately preceding that section) insert—

"218A Right to strike

(1) A trade union has the right, and it shall be lawful, to call for or to support or encourage workers to take industrial action as a means of resolving or seeking to resolve any dispute or as a means of achieving or seeking to achieve any object which relates to any workers' interests at work including (without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing) economic and social matters which affect any workers or the trade union or on which the trade union has a policy.

(2) Every worker has the right, and it shall be lawful, to take industrial action as a means of resolving or seeking to resolve any dispute or as a means of achieving or seeking to achieve any object which relates to any workers' interests at work including (without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing) economic and social matters which affect any workers or the trade union or on which the trade union has a policy.

(3) In this Act 'industrial action' shall include the act of peacefully assembling and of picketing or refusing to cross a picket.".

(3) Omit sections 219, 220, 222 to 235A and 240 to 246.'.

New clause 13—Ballots on industrial action—

'(1) The 1992 Act is amended as follows.

(2) Before section 226 (but after the cross-heading immediately preceding that section) insert—

"225A Ballots on industrial action

(1) The rules referred to in section 3(2)(a) shall contain provisions requiring a ballot to be held (save in exceptional or emergency situations) of members which the trade union reasonably identifies as those likely to be invited by it to take industrial action and those rules shall be approved by the Certification Officer as reasonable, and such approval shall not be unreasonably withheld.

(2) No person or body other than a member of the union concerned may bring legal action which relies to any degree on an allegation that the balloting obligations of the union have not been met.".

New clause 17—Industrial action: deduction from wages—

'When a worker has taken part in official industrial action, the employer may not make a deduction from the worker's wages in respect of that action which exceeds the amount which the worker would have earned if he had not taken part in that action.'.

Amendment No. 10, in page 18, line 38, leave out Clauses 21 to 23.

Amendment No. 11, in page 48, line 47 [Schedule 2], leave out from beginning to end of line 3 on page 49 and insert—

'Sections 219 and 220.Sections 222 to 235A.Sections 240 to 246.'.

Amendment No. 12, in page 48, line 47 [Schedule 2], leave out from beginning to end of line 3 on page 49 and insert—

'Sections 226 to 234A.'.

John McDonnell: I realise that we have less than an hour left in this debate, so I shall try to be as brief as possible, as I know that Members want to reach amendment No. 1, which is the last on the selection list.

This group represents an attempt to place in British law the right to strike. New clause 11 looks at the right to strike, new clause 12 is on secondary action and picketing, new clause 13 is on balloting, new clause 17 reiterates new clause 11 on deduction from wages, and new clause 9 relates to issues about injunctions.

The basis of the discussion leads on from the Second Reading debate, to which many Members contributed. As Members are aware, the right to strike does not exist in British law. The only protections that strikers have are as a result of breaches of individual contracts of employment by industrial action, which is based on a legal immunity built up over time. That is in complete contradiction to the international agreements signed by successive Governments—the International Labour Organisation conventions, the Council of Europe social charter, and the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights.

This is an attempt to address in some way the extension of the immunities allowed to people who take industrial action. It does not strike at the heart of the Government's failure to abide by international conventions, which would require the right to strike to be legislated for in this country. In most European countries, lawful strike does not break the contract of employment but merely suspends it, so it is unlawful to sack a worker on lawful strike, and the courts will prevent it. Were that the law here, there would be no need for the complex unfair dismissal rules to protect strikers that we have debated at length over the last 15 to 20 years. New clause 11 attempts to arrive at a clarification of the right to strike.

In the last debate in 1999, there was an attempt to extend immunities with the eight-week rule. The Friction Dynamics dispute demonstrated that that protection was inadequate. This Bill yet again applies further conditions to ameliorate the eight-week rule and enhance the protections, but in my view will also prove inadequate. In the Friction Dynamics case, it was demonstrated that many of the protections outlined in this Bill were already taken into account by the appeal tribunal. What we really need is an amendment to delete section 238A and provide that, when a worker is engaged in industrial action called by a trade union—lawfully, of course—pursuant to section 219, such industrial action shall not in any circumstances be held to constitute a breach of the contract of employment, but instead shall suspend the obligations under the contract of both the employee and the employer during the currency of the industrial action.

Since the industrial action breaches the contract of employment, the worker is not entitled to be paid for time while taking industrial action. That would obviously equally apply if the contract were suspended during the action. Nowadays, however, employers often deduct wages on an unfair daily basis when the sum deducted is more than the worker would have earned had she or he performed all her or his duties that day. The new clause provides for a worker taking industrial action not to be penalised by losing more than the sum that would have been earned had he or she not taken such action. That, indeed, is the purport of new clauses 11 and 17.

At present, the immunity allowed to a worker taking strike action protects that worker from specific torts in common law. One protection that it does not give is the ability to take action very specifically unrelated to the worker's direct employment. Industrial action is protected against that limited range of torts only if it is in contemplation of furtherance of a dispute that is wholly or mainly related to the terms and conditions of employment, or to other matters specified in the legislation such as job losses, disciplinary issues and trade union recognition or derecognition. If, according to a court, the union's predominant motive falls outside such statutory trade dispute issues, the immunity will be lost.

New clause 12 would extend the immunities. Sections 219 and 244 of the 1992 Act would be deleted, and it would be provided that

"A trade union has the right, and it shall be lawful, to call for or to encourage workers to take industrial action as a means of resolving any dispute . . . to any workers' interests at work including . . . economic and social matters which affect the worker or the trade union or on which the trade union has a policy."

In other words, when a trade union was pursuing a particular policy not specifically related to the company involved but more widely related to the economic and social conditions in an area, such action would be lawful.

Under current UK law, a trade dispute must be between employees and their own employer. If the relevant dispute is between another employer and his employees, it is unlawful for a union to call for sympathetic or so-called secondary action. My proposals support the ILO and the Council of Europe, which have condemned that blanket ban. The new clause would enable secondary action to take place, and workers taking such action would be protected from unfair dismissal.

The Government have written into British law a guaranteed ability to assemble peacefully, under the Human Rights Act 1998. New clause 12 would enable pickets to assemble peacefully to attempt to persuade people not to cross a picket line. The Bill does not deal with that problem. Section 222 of the 1992 Act should be amended to give workers the right to assemble peacefully under the Human Rights Act, and to picket any place of work.

New clause 13 deals with ballots. Even when industrial action falls within the narrow statutory definition of a trade dispute, a trade union will lose immunity if it fails to comply with the highly complex procedures requiring a fully postal strike ballot and so forth, which we have discussed in the context of a series of employment and trade union-related measures over the last six years. Pre-ballot and pre-strike notices in due form must be sent to the employer in a dispute, in accordance with the strict timetable set out. The employer will therefore be able to injunct the union if the procedures are not adhered to.

The Bill goes some way towards overcoming a number of problems of detail relating to balloting procedures, but it should be for workers and their unions to decide how best to ascertain collective views. Workplace ballots might be more suitable in some circumstances, but in emergencies a ballot might have to come after action had taken place. That is demonstrated by industrial action in my constituency at British Airways and elsewhere. My new clauses would place the onus on the certification officer to clarify and verify the procedures set out in the union's rules to ensure that they allowed for democratic participation by members in decisions on industrial action, but would not allow employers themselves to intervene to injunct individual unions or prevent action. It would be up to individual trade unionists to injunct or take up the issue with their unions.

A range of restrictions already exist to impede fair deliberation about industrial action. A further problem in current industrial action law is the use of interlocutory injunctions. That emergency procedure does not require the claimant to prove the alleged facts either beyond all reasonable doubt or on the balance of probabilities. It is sufficient for the employer to assert facts that, as long as they appear credible, will be accepted by the court, notwithstanding that the union has evidence to the contrary. The employer need not even demonstrate that its case is stronger than the union's; it is enough to show a serious issue to be tried. If credible facts are asserted and an arguable case under law is demonstrated, the court will more or less automatically grant an injunction if the balance of convenience favours it. In practice, the court will almost invariably grant the injunction to stop the industrial action, unless the union shows that the employer's legal argument is unsustainable, because the balance of convenience invariably tilts in the employer's favour.

The Council of Europe's economic and social rights committee has condemned that lack of balance between employer and trade union, as has the International Labour Organisation's committee of experts. The Bill does not deal with that matter, but new clause 9 would ensure that unless there is a full trial.

"No injunction or interdict shall be granted to restrain exercise of the right to strike by a trade union or any workers"

Much has been said about the need for balance between employer and worker. These new clauses and amendments would endorse the legal right to strike, which the Government have accepted in one international treaty after another, and balance the legal strengths of employer and worker in the discussions and deliberations leading up to industrial action.

Mr. Djanogly: Injunctions have probably saved an enormous amount of time and cost for all parties concerned. New clause 9 would allow a strike to go ahead and its rights and wrongs to be considered later. That would be a recipe for mayhem, albeit legal mayhem, and would involve enormous costs—probably the bankrupting of unions—with very little being achieved.

I take it that, however long a strike lasted, workers' rights would be fully protected, presumably even if the company went into insolvency as a result. New clauses 12 and 13 would give a right to strike on the broadest possible terms. I think that they technically maintain the difference between official and unofficial action, but the concepts are merged to such an extent that there is little difference between them. Given that the ballot could be undertaken by the union with no one except its own members able to complain to the courts about the ballot process, I do not see how it would be meaningful at all.

Having briefly addressed the new clauses, I can safely say that I am not in favour of any of them.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I rise to speak briefly about the experience of my constituents involved in the Friction Dynamics strike, to which the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) referred earlier. I shall not go into the details of the strike, but it pointed up the weaknesses of current legislation, especially the eight-week rule. At an earlier stage, I welcomed clause 21 as a partial answer, and the extension period in relation to lockouts is certainly welcome. However, I suspect that if clause 21 is passed, bad employers will continue in their intransigence up to and beyond a period of 16 weeks. If that had happened in the case in my constituency, I presume that my constituents would still be picketing today, three years after the start of their strike.

I tend to think that the abolition of the eight-week rule would encourage bad employers to come to the table, which is what good employers do anyway. No commercial undertaking wants to extend a strike unless it has a particular motivation for doing so, as we saw in the case of Friction Dynamics. As I said, where there is no lockout, the eight-week rule will still apply. Had Friction Dynamics' management played their cards rather more carefully, the strike would have continued and they would not have been found guilty by an industrial tribunal. So the situation would have been the same as before the various discussions that took place about the Friction Dynamics strike. Plaid Cymru's position remains the same: if a strike is lawful for eight weeks, we see no reason why the protection should not be applied during the ninth and further weeks, and we regard the Employment Relations Act 1999 as a compromise that needs to be looked at again.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) for the brevity with which he spoke to the new clauses and amendments, notwithstanding the seriousness of the issues that he raised. I am grateful to him for recognising that time is against us.

This is a large group of new clauses and amendments that would radically change the law on industrial action, and the law on the consequences to the individual of taking industrial action. As my hon. Friends have said, the amendments would rewrite the law on industrial action. At a stroke, they would delete virtually all of part 5 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, substituting it with a few new sections that provide rights to trade unions and their members, but which systematically ignore the interests of employers and society at large.

I do not intend to address the detail of the new clauses and amendments as we have little time. Instead, I shall address the more fundamental question that my hon. Friend is really asking me to address: whether a total reworking of these provisions is required. This body of law was mainly constructed during the 1980s, but its basic principles have been in place for a great deal longer. We know that unions resisted these changes when they were introduced. Some resented the interference in their internal affairs and the resulting democratisation of their decision-making procedures; many resented the more limited immunities against legal action that were introduced. However, unions have generally learned to live with the provisions. Their members have benefited from the greater control over their unions' decisions that the law has required. Employers have benefited from knowing that they cannot be dragged into industrial disputes that have nothing to do with them; and, more generally, society has benefited from less widespread and less damaging industrial action.

The new clauses and amendments seek to take us back to the days of the 1960s and 1970s, when strikes significantly damaged our economy and the way in which we lived. They would reintroduce an entitlement to take secondary action, and would encourage wildcat strikes and other forms of damaging unofficial action. We want to frame the law in a way that deals with the realities of today's labour market, so it would be a profound mistake to turn the clock back. For these reasons, the Labour party made it plain in its 1997 manifesto that it would retain the key elements of the changes introduced in the 1980s. We will honour that commitment.

Some might argue that the current law is imbalanced and puts unions in an impossibly weak position vis-à-vis the employer; I do not believe that that is the case. If that were so, employers would never deal with unions or choose to settle their disputes with them voluntarily. The evidence suggests that the strike weapon remains a potent one if union members really support it. Only in a minority of cases is a successful vote in favour of industrial action actually followed by a strike or another form of industrial action. Employers prefer to resolve their differences voluntarily, rather than incurring the cost and disruption of industrial action.

My hon. Friend pointed to the International Labour Organisation's conventions and similar international instruments. It is fashionable in some quarters to interpret our international obligations in this area in the widest possible way. The truth is that the various treaties are drafted in very general terms and are capable of a wide range of interpretations. Those interpretations vary with each member state's industrial relations practices and traditions. Although it is true that some ILO advisory bodies have criticised our law on industrial action, we have always tried to answer those criticisms with reasoned arguments. We are convinced that we comply with our international obligations. The ILO gives due regard to our opinions, and understands that it is perfectly possible for different parties to interpret in good faith the implications of its conventions in different ways. As a result, the ILO's governing body has never formally reprimanded us for failing to comply with key conventions 87 and 98. Our standing with the ILO is as high as ever.

New clauses 11 and 17 and amendment No. 10 deal with the consequences for individuals of taking industrial action. New clause 10 and amendment No. 10 would delete the provisions in the Bill that strengthen the protection for employees taking lawfully organised, official industrial action. In their place, new clause 11 introduces an entirely new protective regime.

The basic aim of the new clause is to ensure that the protection is indefinite. We have already debated that issue many times, during our consideration of the Bill and during the passage of the Employment Relations Act 1999. Indeed, the issue was looked at in detail during our review of that Act. Our position is that we need to put a time limit on the period during which it is automatically unfair to dismiss someone taking industrial action. In industrial action law, we need to balance the legitimate interests of the employer and those of union members. That might not immediately appeal to my hon. Friend, but the Government want to create a fair regime for all interested parties and not just for one. Eight weeks is, in our judgment, a fair period. It covers the overwhelming majority of stoppages, 98 per cent. of which are dealt with within that period.

The case of Friction Dynamics was mentioned by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams), who supported us in Committee by recognising that we were tidying up the position on lock-out days and by accepting that we were asking both sides to take reasonable steps to resolve the dispute. We wanted to toughen up the position so that a Friction Dynamics situation could not happen again: both sides would have to prove that they tried reasonably to resolve the dispute. The action that took place has been condemned on both sides of the House.

The Bill will strengthen the protections introduced in the 1999 Act in a targeted way that will resolve problems that have arisen in practice. The provisions may not meet everyone's aspirations in the union movement, but I believe that they are generally seen as an advance.

New clause 17 places limits on the deductions from pay that employers may make when their employees take industrial action. That issue arose in the tertiary education sector, where the unions believe that employers made excessively large deductions. I think I am right in saying that the issue has not affected many other sectors, so it is not a matter that was highlighted in the representations that we received in preparing the Bill or during the review of the Employment Relations Act.

I am not yet convinced that the issues need to be specifically addressed in industrial action law. Of course, there are already entitlements for workers to complain to employment tribunals about unauthorised deductions from pay. I hope that those existing protections would help the workers concerned in those cases, although I recognise that the breach of contract that occurs when workers take industrial action might complicate the position.

The new clause contains a simple rule of thumb for deductions, but I am not sure that it provides the right answer. For example, there may be a legitimate case for employers to make some proportionate reduction to holiday pay or to make some adjustment to the calculation of an employee's length of service for pension purposes.

In conclusion, I am not yet convinced that there is a problem that needs to be dealt with—or, if there is, that new clause 17 provides the right solution. However, I would be happy to meet my hon. Friend if he believes that it is a sufficiently serious issue.

For reasons that I have explained, I do not wish to speak to the amendments in any further detail. Unfortunately, I find myself in agreement with many of the comments made by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), which is an unusual occurrence in this place. I ask my hon. Friend to withdraw his new clause.

John McDonnell: With such a resounding welcome for the new clauses, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 10

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

'(1) Omit paragraph 7 of Schedule A1 to the 1992 Act.

(2) In paragraph 35(1) of that Schedule—

(a) after "agreement", insert "supported by a majority of workers within the relevant bargaining unit";

(b) after "to", insert "and does";

(c) after "bargaining", insert "in relation at least to pay, hours and holidays";

(d) for "any" substitute "a substantial number of".'.— [John McDonnell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

John McDonnell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following amendments: No. 8, in page 9, line 3, leave out Clause 8.

No. 9, in page 49, line 10 [Schedule 2], after 'paragraphs', insert '7'.

John McDonnell: The new clause and associated amendments deal with a problem that has arisen in several disputes, which I would like briefly to outline. It first occurred in a dispute leading to the case of OILC v. Wood Group Engineering (North Sea) Ltd. in August 2003. Despite the fact that the overwhelming majority of the core workers on the Brent oil platforms were OILC members and wanted the union to negotiate with their employer, Wood Group Engineering (North Sea) Ltd. on their behalf, the application was refused on the ground that the employer set the workers' terms and conditions by reference to a collective agreement between the Offshore Contractors Association and the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union and the GMB. That was held to debar the OILC from seeking recognition.

The same problem occurred in the case of NUJ v. Mirror Group Newspapers plc, where a claim for recognition by the National Union of Journalists at the Racing Post was rejected by the Central Arbitration Committee. As in the previous case, the NUJ was about to finalise a deal with the employer, who decided instead to make a recognition deal with the British Association of Journalists—a tiny union that at the time had not a single member at the Racing Post. It claimed to have one, whose name it had forgotten, at the time of the CAC hearing some months later, despite the employer circulating letters from the BAJ begging journalists to join and offering free subscriptions. At the time of the hearing, the BAJ had not carried out any collective bargaining on behalf of the workers in that firm, who shunned the BAJ. In the view of many, that was a breach of article 11 of the European convention on human rights, which allows workers the right to be heard via their trade union. The new clause would ensure that a trade union that has a majority of a work force as members is not frustrated by an employer rushing into agreement with another organisation, which may have no membership or a minuscule membership in that firm, in advance of a CAC hearing and decision.

As the law stands, it grants representation to the first comer, not to the most representative organisation. The amendment would put the Government's legislation in line with international law, but at the same time would accept the democratic wishes of the majority of the individuals working for a particular company who could demand to be represented by the union of their choice.

Mr. Djanogly: On a technical point, I do not believe that there is a paragraph 7 or 35 to schedule A1 to the 1992 Act—perhaps the hon. Gentleman was referring to the Employment Relations Act 1999; he may wish to clarify that point. At present, the recognition process applies only when a company has at least 21 workers and the new clause would open up union recognition in any company, however few workers it had. That would be an utter disaster for most small businesses, and for the competitive state of our economy.

In any event, the statistics do not show union recognition in small companies to be a relevant consideration. The Minister told us in Committee that only 12 applications for statutory recognition came from companies with 21 to 30 employees—less than 5 per cent. of the whole. Barely 10 per cent. of applications came from companies with between 31 and 50 employees. Companies do not appear interested in union recognition with that number of employees, and neither do the employees. Unions might not be interested in becoming involved at that level, probably because of the cost implications with so few members. For companies with fewer than 50 employees, none of the parties appears interested in recognition and to that extent, instead of the figure of 21 being struck out of the legislation, it should be raised to 50.

Mr. Tynan: In a way, I support the proposition that has been put before us. Everyone is nasty about trade unions, and, at present, if companies have fewer than 21 employees they are excluded from trade union recognition. However, if Opposition Members recognised the value that trade unions can bring to a company, they would better understand industrial relations in this country. We start from different points of view. It is thought that unions are bad if they are involved in a small, family company, because that is not the way business should be done.

In my former life as a trade union official, I often found that small companies recognised the worth of trade unions and negotiated with them, on not an official but an ad hoc basis. They had no objection to their employees being members of a trade union. If we exclude companies where there are fewer than 21 workers, we do a disservice to those who want union recognition. Union recognition is not bad—it can be a good thing.

Mr. Djanogly: No one is saying that people should not be members of a trade union—that is their right; we are talking about recognition.

Mr. Tynan: That is where we differ from Opposition Members. If 20 people in a company want to join a trade union and we are agreed that they have that right, I can see nothing wrong in the employer recognising those 20 people as a bargaining unit. Perhaps we should consider extending bargaining rights where there are fewer than 21 people in a business, although I realise that is not on the agenda tonight.

There has been considerable discussion with the TUC and employers, but we need to send the message that in future we shall continue to look at the needs of workers in companies. There are some very bad small employers and a trade union is needed to defend their workers, who are treated very badly. I hope that Opposition Members do not condone bad employers who treat their workers badly.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Rather than looking at the negatives, does my hon. Friend agree that we should look at the positives? For example, the Government's policies on stakeholder pensions could offer trade unions in small companies a valuable way to organise the work force to help employers understand why pensionability is vital for their workers.

Mr. Tynan: I do not disagree with my hon. Friend.

In Committee, we discussed a range of issues relating to trade union membership and how we would deal with them. We accepted that the Bill is a good one. Yes, there is room for amendment, and we should be signalling to the Minister that we may have to revisit some aspects in the future. I support the new clause, but I hope that it is withdrawn, because I understand the points that have been made. The Minister should take careful note of what has been proposed, however; perhaps we can move in that direction in the future.

Malcolm Bruce: When the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) introduced the new clause, he gave two examples. The second seemed to be a blatant illustration of the abuse that the provision would address, but I was rather puzzled by his first example, which sounded more like an inter-union dispute; indeed, the North sea problems rose from it. Operational working is such that contractors move on and off platforms. I am not arguing for or against the Wood offshore case, but the company presumably argued that it already had an established agreement with a trade union and was on the platform for the duration of a particular contract, but that the OILC was trying to get in on the act. That may not have been so, but that is how it sounded.

John McDonnell: No one was aware that the union agreement actually existed.

Malcolm Bruce: Presumably, the management were aware of it. The point is that there are particular problems for the organisation of North sea workers.

The hon. Gentleman's second example was central, however. It is important that the Minister acknowledge the fact that there was a wholly self-interested attempt to destroy the legitimate aspiration of the work force to have the union they wanted. We must address the fact that managements could undermine not only the spirit of unionism but the fundamental principle that people have the right to belong to the union of their choice.

Mr. Sutcliffe: In view of the time, I shall race through my response, although that is not to underplay the seriousness of the issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) has raised.

Let me say to the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) that the Government do not oppose recognition in companies with fewer than 21 workers. The argument is whether there should be statutory procedures in respect of such companies, and the evidence given to the hon. Gentleman exposes the position in that respect. However, I am sure that we shall return to the matter, in connection with rights to have a companion during dispute resolution procedures and so on.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) spoke about offshore oil rigs and he is right to say that we should not be drawn into inter-union disputes. The case is—or used to be—governed by the TUC's Bridlington principles and is a matter for the TUC.

As for the case involving the NUJ and Mirror Group Newspapers, my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington will know that judicial review is likely, so I cannot say anything at this stage. However, I acknowledge the issues that have been raised.

On collective agreements, we in the UK have a culture of voluntary procedures that does not exist elsewhere. There are matters to examine—for example, sweetheart deals with employers—but I hope that, having put the issues on the record, my hon. Friend will withdraw his new clause.

John McDonnell: I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

EFFECT OF CONTINUATION OF CONTRACT ORDER ON TRANSFER OF UNDERTAKINGS

"(1) Section 130 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (c.26) (order for continuation of contract of employment) is amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (1)(a) omit the word "and".

(3) After subsection (1)(b) insert—

(c) for the purposes of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981,".'.—[John McDonnell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

John McDonnell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I seem to be trying to write the next piece of Government legislation on employment relations. Let me zip through this new clause as well.

Several hon. Members have continuing problems with the operation of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. Section 129 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 provides for a special form of relief in the case of dismissal for trade union-related activities, and a person who claims unfair dismissal on those grounds may also make an application to the tribunal for interim relief. On an interim relief application, if the tribunal considers that the individual has better than even chances of success at the full hearing, the tribunal can make a continuation of contract order under section 129. That means that the contract is deemed to continue and the employer must continue to pay wages and other benefits due under the contract from the date of termination of the contract until the complaint of unfair dismissal is determined or settled.

That is an important remedy for those who are dismissed on trade union-related grounds, especially as claims for unfair dismissal can take many months to be determined in tribunal. However, in the recent case of Dowling v. M E Ilic Haulage Ltd., the business was sold on after a continuation order was made. An application was made to join the transferee—the business that had bought the business—as a respondent, but the tribunal accepted the transferee's argument that the effect of a continuation of contract order was limited to the payment of pay and benefits, and continuity of employment; it did not mean that the contract continued, so the applicant's employment did not transfer on the business being sold and the transferee could not be joined as a respondent.

The Employment Appeal Tribunal has upheld the decision and there is no application to appeal. Therefore, as the law stands, where a continuation of contract order has been made, the employee is extremely vulnerable if the business is sold on. We must bear in mind the fact that the transferor may have only small funds or even be insolvent, whereas the transferee will generally be viable and able to meet any awards or even to reinstate the employee if he succeeds in his claims. The new clause stipulates that the continuation of contract order has effect for the purposes of the TUPE regulations. That, in turn, means that the transferee can be joined as a respondent, and if the application is successful, the employee can be reinstated to or claim compensation from the transferee.

Although it would make a minor amendment, the new clause could bring great relief and overcome a technical problem.

Mr. Sutcliffe: As my hon. Friend says, the new clause is designed to extend the effect of a tribunal order made under section 129 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. The effect of an order under section 129 for the continuation of a contract of employment is dealt with in section 130, which provides that the contract should continue in force for the purposes of pay, pension rights, continuity of employment and other such matters. The new clause would add another category to those specified in section 130 by providing that a contract that a tribunal orders to continue in force would do so for the purposes of the TUPE regulations. In my opinion, the addition is unnecessary. The TUPE regulations already have the effect of preserving rights that arise pursuant to the contract of employment. That protection extends to statutory employment rights arising pursuant to the contract of employment.

I sympathise with the spirit in which the clause was tabled, but, as I have already explained, there is no need for it. I respectfully ask my hon. Friend to withdraw it.

John McDonnell: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 16

EXCLUSION OR EXPULSION FROM TRADE UNION

'(1) Section 174 of the 1992 Act (right not to be excluded or expelled from trade union) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (2)(d) for "entirely attributable to his conduct" substitute "in accordance with the rules of the union relating to exclusion or expulsion unless the consequence of exclusion or expulsion is that the excluded or expelled person is for that reason denied or deprived of employment or unless the exclusion or expulsion is unlawful.".

(3) Omit subsection (4).'.—[John McDonnell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

John McDonnell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 26, in page 48, line 40 [Schedule 2], at end insert—

'Section 174(4).'.

John McDonnell: I shall be exceedingly brief. The new clause and the amendment deal with the right of trade unions to exclude members. That obviously relates to the case of Mr. Steff and ASLEF. Mr. Steff was a member of the British National party.

The new clause gives effect to article 11 of the European convention on human rights and fundamental freedoms, which is part of UK law by reason of the Human Rights Act 1998. Article 11 explains that a person can be excluded from an association as long as that does not result in a disproportionate penalty or unlawful discrimination. The only right to prevent somebody joining a union is if that would result in a disproportionate penalty—for example, loss of employment—or if it would be contrary to the law on discrimination on the grounds of race, sex, gender and so on. The purpose behind the new clause is to put into the Bill, simply and clearly, the ability of a trade union to determine which person can join. At the same time, it prevents a union from discriminating against people if it would result in loss of employment or offend existing legislation.

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend will know that in Committee I introduced a new clause—it is now clause 28—to give unions the latitude to deal adequately with political activists who pursue a racist or xenophobic political agenda. Our main aim was to ensure that unions could deal effectively with the kind of far-right political activists who are infiltrating their ranks and sowing the seeds of hatred and intolerance. At the same time, we wanted to protect the essential freedom of individuals to belong to a political party. I believe that there is widespread support for the Government in tackling this issue.

Amendment No. 31 deletes the existing clause 28 so that new clause 16 can take effect. New clause 16 aims to achieve some of the same effects but does so in a different way. The new clause aims to give unions greater latitude by ensuring that they can exclude or expel individuals as long as it is within the union's rules to do so, and as long as it is lawful to do so and the exclusion or expulsion does not result in the individual being denied or deprived of employment.

Both clause 28 and my hon. Friend's amendments cover similar territory. In many respects, we share common objectives. However, I believe that our clause is to be preferred. My hon. Friend's amendments go too far and would threaten important freedoms.

New clause 16 would give unions a wide-ranging freedom to exclude or expel. However, the amendment would take no account of the need to protect essential freedoms for individuals to belong to a political party. Our proposals provide for unions to expel on grounds of political party activities. We believe that is fair. New clause 16 would provide for unions to expel or exclude on those grounds or on the grounds of just belonging to a political party.

I recognise that this issue has a number of human rights implications. It concerns rights of association both for existing union members and aspiring union members. It also raises issues about rights of expression. This is a delicate area. As I have said, I believe that our proposals strike the right balance.

The new clause also refers directly to the "rules of a union". In Committee, questions were raised as to whether the use of this term, in relation to the remedies that are available when an individual is excluded or expelled, is broad enough to cover the aims and objectives of the union in promoting diversity and opposing discrimination. Such objects or aims are not always expressed as union rules. We think that this is an issue that needs to be addressed in clause 28. We are therefore holding discussions with the TUC with a view to bringing forward amendments in the other place. I urge my hon. Friend to withdraw the new clause and related amendments.

John McDonnell: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 18

PROTECTION OF JOURNALISTS

'After section 104C of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (c.18) insert—

"104D Journalists

An employee who is dismissed shall be regarded for the purposes of this Part as unfairly dismissed, if the reason (or, of more than one, the principal reason) for the dismissal is that—

(a) the employee works as a journalist and,

(b) refused (or proposed to refuse) to carry out any act that would amount to a contravention of the Press Complaints Commission Code of Practice that applies at that time.".'.—[John McDonnell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

John McDonnell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Journalists have come under pressure in recent times with regard to their employment, as a result of their courage in standing by their code of practice as agreed by the Press Complaints Commission. A number of journalists have made it clear to their employers that they wish to uphold the status of their profession by adhering to the code of practice, which ensures, for example, that they do not misrepresent, that they do not identify or in any way contribute to the identification of victims of sexual assault, and that they protect their confidential sources.

The new clause introduces into British law a conscience clause to protect that area of employment. The clause would ensure that any attempt to dismiss a journalist for refusing to break the Press Complaints Commission code of practice would be unlawful and therefore actionable in law in respect of compensation. The issue has come up on a number of occasions. There is a case that is currently sub judice so we cannot refer to it, but the National Union of Journalists believes that the matter should be debated adequately and that we should return to it later.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Let me stress that the Government always deplore arbitrary and unfair dismissals. The unfair dismissal legislation, which is generally considered to be working well, has been carefully drawn up to ensure that employees are protected against unfair treatment. For a dismissal to be fair, an employer must not only have dismissed the employee for a fair reason, but must have acted reasonably in doing so. As hon. Members know, the legislation also specifies certain particularly serious reasons for dismissal that are regarded as automatically unfair. These include, for instance, pregnancy or maternity, and trade union membership, non-membership or activities. My hon. Friend seeks to add to these reasons.

Before any additions to the list of automatically unfair reasons are considered, however, we must be clear that they are both necessary and appropriate, and I do not believe that the addition proposed by my hon. Friend fits either criterion, although I am sympathetic to his underlying concern. I understand that the Press Complaints Commission code of conduct applies to editors and publishers, as well as to those who work for them. A publisher or editor's dismissal of a journalist for declining to breach a code of conduct that applies equally to both parties is most unlikely to be considered a fair one by an employment tribunal, and to that extent the amendment is unnecessary.

I also understand, however, that exceptions to some of the code's provisions can be made in exceptional circumstances, and to that extent the amendment is inappropriate. It assumes, in effect, that no breach is ever defensible, and thus that no journalist should ever be called to account by his employer for refusing to depart from its recommendations. That goes too far in constraining employers. I hope my hon. Friend will accept these points. In view of the ample protection provided by the existing legislation, I invite him to withdraw the new clause.

John McDonnell: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 5

UNION COMMUNICATIONS WITH WORKERS AFTER ACCEPTANCE OF APPLICATION

Amendment made: No. 4, in page 7, line 29, leave out '(4)' and insert

'(4ZE) (which is inserted by section (Additional duties on employers informed of ballots))'.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

POWER TO AMEND SCHEDULE A1 TO THE 1992 ACT

Amendments made: No. 5, in page 11, line 10, after '7(6),', insert '27C,'.

No. 6, in page 11, line 10, after '29(5),', insert '119C,'.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

Clause 24

INDUCEMENTS RELATING TO UNION MEMBERSHIP OR ACTIVITIES

John McDonnell: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 21, line 8, leave out from '(1) to 'of' in line 9 and insert

'An employer shall not make an offer or a threat to any worker with the purpose or the effect'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 16, in page 21, line 35, after 'worker', insert 'or a trade union'.

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

No. 22, in page 21, line 36, leave out 'his' and insert 'the worker's'.

No. 17, in page 21, line 36, leave out 'him' and insert 'the worker'.

No. 18, in page 21, line 39, leave out

'which is recognised by his employer'.

No. 19, in page 22, line 14, after 'worker', insert 'or a trade union'.

No. 21, in page 22, line 15, leave out 'his' and insert 'the worker's'.

No. 20, in page 22, line 15, leave out 'him' and insert 'the worker'.

No. 23, in page 24, line 32 [Clause 26], leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) For subsection (1) substitute—

"(1) A worker has the right not to be subjected to any detriment as an individual by any act, or any deliberate failure to act, by his employer done on the ground that—

(a) he was or sought to become a member of an independent trade union,

(b) he took part or sought to take part in the activities of an independent trade union at an appropriate time,

(c) he made use of or sought to make use of trade union services at an appropriate time,

(d) he failed to accept an offer made in contravention of section 145A or 145B, or

(e) he was not a member of any trade union or of a particular trade union or one of a number of particular trade unions.".'.

No. 13, in page 24, line 32, after '(1),' insert

'after "purpose" insert "or with the effect", after "part" in paragraph (b) insert "or seeking to take part",'.

No. 14, in page 24, line 34, after 'use', insert

'or seeking to make use'.

No. 24, in page 25, line 4, leave out 'worker's "making use" ' and insert

'worker having "made use of or sought to make use of".'.

No. 25, in page 25, line 9, leave out from 'as' to end of line 10 and insert

'subjecting the worker to detriment on that ground is to be treated as subjecting him to a detriment within subsection (1)(c)'.

No. 28, in page 25, leave out lines 11 to 14.

No. 29, in page 25, line 15, leave out '(2C)' and insert '(1)(d)'.

No. 7, in page 25, line 18, at end insert—

'(4A) After subsection (4), insert—

"(4A) The payment of higher wages or higher rates of pay or overtime or the payment of signing on or other bonus or the provision of other benefits having a monetary value to other workers employed by the same employer shall not constitute a detriment to any worker not receiving the same or similar payments or benefits so long as—

(a) there is no inhibition in the contract of employment of the worker receiving the same from being a member of any trade union, and

(b) the said payments of higher wages or rates of pay or overtime or bonuses or the provision of other benefits are in accordance with the terms of a contract of employment and reasonably relate to the services provided by the worker under that contract.".'.

No. 30, in page 25, line 20, at end insert—

'(5A) In subsection (1) of section 148 of the 1992 Act, before the word 'purpose' insert "grounds on which, or, as the case may be,".'.

John McDonnell: Time does not permit a full debate of the issues covered by the amendments, so I shall refer to only one element. It was pointed out on Second Reading that, as the Bill is framed, it is almost impossible to interpret the meaning of "purpose". An employee would have to demonstrate that an employer was subjecting the employee to a detriment for the purpose of preventing or deterring the worker from performing a protected activity or penalising the worker for doing so. Already we struggle in courts of law to demonstrate the purpose. The employer need only give some vaguely plausible reason in order to wriggle out of the provisions of the current legislation. I urge a re-examination of the clause to see whether we can tighten it and incorporate in the legislation the true spirit of the judgment in the Wilson and Palmer case.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I appreciate my hon. Friend's brevity in dealing with a major issue in respect of the judgment in the Wilson and Palmer case.

The Government believe that we have clearly set out our position in clauses that were discussed earlier. We think this is an issue around purpose. I was happy to meet Mr. Wilson of the Wilson and Palmer case, who is satisfied with what the Government have done. I ask my hon. Friend to seek leave to withdraw the amendment, as while I accept that there is a variance between us, the Government have moved some way towards incorporating the Wilson and Palmer judgment.

John McDonnell: I met Mr. Wilson as well on Friday, and I think that he has set his video recorder for this debate. I do not think that he is completely ecstatic with the Bill as it is now proposed, and I am sure that he would back further amendments. Perhaps we can discuss that at a later time. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Bellingham: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) would like to speak to our amendment No. 7. [Interruption.] She was present at the start of the debate. Would it be possible for her to speak to amendment No. 7?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I did not see the hon. Lady in her place trying to catch my eye.

Mr. Djanogly: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Not only did my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) stand up to catch your eye, but so did I, so I would appreciate it if that could be put on the record as well.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Both hon. Members were standing, but it was at the point when the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) was withdrawing his amendment. I thought that we were moving to the next debate.

Mrs. Laing: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I fully appreciate that the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) was withdrawing amendment No. 15, but it was my intention to propose amendment No. 7, which stands on the amendment paper in my name and those of my hon. Friends.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have to advise the hon. Lady that we have now come to amendment No. 3, and although she stood up, it was not clear that she wished to speak. There was no indication that she wished to speak on that particular amendment. I have to say that we have now reached amendment No. 3.

INFORMATION AND CONSULTATION: GREAT BRITAIN

in page 30, line 9, at end insert—

'(1A) The Secretary of State shall consult such persons as he considers appropriate on the establishment of works councils as an arrangement suitable for informing and consulting employees and shall publish the responses received pursuant to those consultations, together with guidance on best practice for works councils, before making the regulations referred to in subsection (1).'.

I wish to mark a card for this amendment, which the Liberal Democrats consider extremely important. As the Minister will know from discussions in Committee, we consider that works councils are important not only for employees, but for employers, in ensuring that companies are run well and with the full co-operation and help of their employees. In view of the lateness of the hour, I say to the Minister that I hope that he has taken on board our arguments and that he will accept that we have a valid argument and at least recognise that the works council approach has merit and is worth consideration.

Mr. Sutcliffe: There are two aspects to the amendment. On the consultation aspect, the implementation of the information and consultation directive has been the result of extensive consultation, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The amendment would impose a statutory requirement not only when the regulations are made initially, but whenever they may be amended in future, which would not be desirable. The Department already follows Cabinet Office guidelines on public consultation and publishes the results of such consultations, so a statutory obligation would not improve things in practice.

In the case of the information and consultation regulations, we are well aware that the implementation of the directive represents a particularly significant landmark in UK industrial relations, so it is very important that we approach the implementation in a positive and constructive manner. For the first step, we published the discussion document in July 2002, and we held a series a round-table discussions up and down the country with a wide range of individual businesses and their representatives, unions and employment experts, to discuss how best to approach implementation of the directive in the UK. Building on that initial consultation, the Government held discussions with the CBI, the TUC and a range of other organisations about the details of implementation.

An agreed framework for implementing the directive was published on 7 July 2003, together with draft legislation, on which we invited comments, and a further series of round-table discussions were held around the country with a similar mix of experts. I attended five of those discussions myself, other Ministers were present at other events, and copies of the responses to the two consultations are available in the Department of Trade and Industry library. The responses indicate strong and broad support for our approach to implementation, and since the second consultation closed in November officials have been working with a range of stakeholders to refine and improve the regulations. We intend to publish a Government response to the consultation before the summer.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter) for raising guidance. The Government have always intended that regulations should be accompanied by guidance. We know that it is very important to all the parties who will be affected by the Bill that guidance is available in advance of the legislation coming into force. We therefore intend to publish draft guidance that will explain how key concepts in the legislation are intended to work in practice. In addition, ACAS will produce best practice guidance that is designed to help information and consultation practitioners get to grips with some of the main issues involved in setting up and running information and consultation procedures. In those circumstances, and notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare has said about the importance of works councils, which may be included in the consultation process, I ask him to withdraw the amendment.

Brian Cotter: I thank the Minister for his answer. We still feel that works councils are important, but, in the light of his comments, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Bellingham: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 41, line 5, leave out Clause 46.

Conservative Members are not against union modernisation, and we are certainly not against trade unions—in fact, we are making a real effort to reach out to them. As I pointed out earlier, the Minister got wind of a meeting that my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Bellingham]

Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) and I had the other day with Mr. Brendan Barber. The meeting was constructive, and we have a great deal in common.

The Minister has said on a number of occasions that the unions have shown remarkable resilience. They are modernising, but the key point is whether the state should fund the process. The Chancellor made it clear in his Budget that the country's finances are fully stretched—borrowing is soaring and a black hole is opening up—but the Government still spend our money with irresponsible abandon. The original budget for the Scottish Parliament was £44 million, but the cost is now more than £400 million, and there are also the Electoral Commission, the supreme court and now the modernisation fund.

Our concern is that there is no ceiling or limit on the money for the modernisation fund. Clause 116A states:

"The Secretary of State may provide money".

The Minister has stated that the sum will be between £5 million and £10 million over several years, but the commitment is open-ended.

Furthermore, the Minister said in Committee that the money may be spent only on specific items, and the clause mentions various items and initiatives that it can be used for. Clause 116A(3) states:

"Money may be provided in such a way as the Secretary of State thinks fit".

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman will surely remember the partnership fund and the working partnership fund, which his party supported. We have set out the union modernisation fund in exactly the same way as the partnership fund.

Mr. Bellingham: The DTI partnership fund discusses match funding, but there is no match funding in the Bill. If the Minister were following the rules of the partnership fund, the unions would have to put up a pound for every pound the Government put up.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Just to be clear, we followed not the rules of the fund, but the way in which it was introduced.

Mr. Bellingham: We are still not satisfied. There should be an equal pool of money. We do not want clause 46 to go ahead, but, if it does, it should be even-handed. Many employer organisations want to modernise, reach out to their members and introduce new ways of communicating and dealing with their members, but there is no money for them. The clause is in no way even-handed: it is completely one-sided. The Minister has said on many occasions that the essence of the Bill is even-handedness, but this provision is not even-handed; it is biased and unnecessary. How do we know that the money is not a sop or a bung to the trade unions? That is why we tabled the amendment to delete the clause.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) set out three concerns: first, the way in which the money might be spent; secondly, the amount of money, there being no cap; and, thirdly, the lack of even-handedness. It surprises me that he did not table an amendment to that effect instead of one that would delete clause 46 altogether. That suggests to me that his true motives are not those that he specified and that he has another agenda—to do down the unions.

Mr. Djanogly: To answer the hon. Gentleman's last point, the reason such an amendment was not tabled is that the Government inserted the provision in Committee at the last minute, so we had no alternative.

I am grateful to be able to speak on this bung clause—the sort of law that most people would not believe could be introduced. It is unbelievable that the Government are not saying how much they will give to the unions. Will it be £5 million or £10 million? Presumably £6.4 million would be the benchmark, as that is the amount that the unions provided to the Labour party last year.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): The money that unions give as donations is governed by their political fund ballot rules. Is the hon. Gentleman aware of those rules?

Mr. Djanogly: I am indeed.

Do unions need modernisation in the first place? They probably do. In January, ASLEF wrote to 40 of its employees listing penalties, including the sack if they went on strike, and derecognition of the GMB union. It looks as though ASLEF does need a bit of modernisation. Last year, the GMB had its own problems. A leaked report shows that 60 employment tribunal cases lodged against the GMB cost it some £4 million. They included cases of sexual harassment, bullying, discrimination, and unfair dismissal; and it had a £19 million deficit in its employee pension fund to boot—no wonder The Guardian reported that it must rank among the worst employers in Britain. Unions probably do need a bit of modernisation, but the question is: should the taxpayer pay for it? My answer would be no.

John Mann: I appreciate that the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) is rather too young to recall some of the activities of previous Governments, but it may help him if I remind him of the moneys given in the late 1980s by the Department of Trade and Industry under Lord Tebbit for the modernisation of trade unions. The hon. Gentleman may also be interested to know that from 1979 to 1992, under successive Governments, the education Department gave money for the modernisation of trade unions.

Mr. Bellingham: During the course of the Conservative Administrations, well over £20 million was given to the trade unions for specific ring-fenced items such as running secret ballots, but this money is completely open-ended.

John Mann: The hon. Gentleman is not too young, but again he gets it wrong. When I applied for money from those two Departments and from others such as the Department of Employment, there was no ring-fencing. The forms were absolutely clear that it was money for modernisation. This is a fine tradition, and I back the proposal.

9.30 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am pleased that we reached the amendment because the discussion demonstrates again the Conservative party's prejudice against trade unions. Conservative Members talk about being pro-trade union. They have held two meetings with Brendan Barber, and I am pleased that they have got into dialogue but I wonder whether they spoke to the unions about modernisation.

Conservative Members' attitude is unsurprising but deeply disappointing because the Bill has tried to foster a new mood of co-operation and a culture change. However, we have the same old Tories saying the same old things about trade unions. I tried to give assurances and explanations in Committee, and I believed that Opposition Members agreed with me about the structure that we were trying to achieve. That certainly applied to Liberal Democrat Members, who opposed the money resolution but accepted some of the points that I made about the culture.

Some trade unions have amalgamated for a variety of reasons. We require a modern approach to employment relations, and that means that trade unions must have the skills to deal with the modern environment. The idea that the money will be used for donations to trade unions is not correct. The suggestion that the money is a bung is simply untrue and part of the scare stories that Conservative Members have presented.

Rob Marris: Will my hon. Friend clarify a point that the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) made? He appeared to suggest that Conservative Members had not had time to table a reasoned amendment to clause 46 commensurate with their views of it.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. From day one of the Committee proceedings, the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) attacked the trade union movement in any way that he saw fit. He stuck to the employers without speaking to them. If he had spoken to them, he would realise that they are impressed by the new culture that the Government are introducing. There is a framework agreement on information and consultation.

The law on political forums is contained in the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, which was tightly drawn. Neither the clause that we are considering nor any provisions in our previous Bill have changed that legal framework. Unions cannot spend money on political objects, including donations to political parties, unless they have established a separate political fund for that purpose. They are prevented by law from using money from their general fund for such purposes. I therefore ask the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk to apologise for describing the money as a bung.

Mr. Bellingham: I shall not apologise because the Minister said that approximately £6 million would be paid to the unions for modernisation. Would not it be better if the £6 million that the trade unions pay the Labour party were used for that modernisation?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's point. It is clear that we are entering a new era of employment relations.

I must apologise to the House because I made a slip of the tongue in the debate on the money resolution when I said that employers' organisations, especially the EEF, had received money for structural changes. That was not correct, and I apologise for it. They had received money for projects. Indeed, £500 million has gone into developing business projects, and that is right. It is a commendable exercise by the Government to enhance and develop business and its activities.

However, we also need to tackle the other side of the equation. As I said earlier, the number of amalgamations between unions has meant that they have experienced a reduction in numbers. It is important that union officials can understand company balance sheets and work out the issues that affect the future of companies, especially, for example, the information and consultation directive.

It is vital to approach the matter in an adult and consensual way and for the fund to be set up in the same way as the partnership fund. It is also vital that there should be much consultation in the summer with employers and employers' organisations. Their representatives will sit on bodies to determine the allocation of the funds in the same way as happened with the partnership fund. The yah-boo-sucks politics of Conservative Members shows that they do not want to have a serious look at the fund; they simply want to scaremonger. They do not support the need for modernisation. They have approached the issues in this part of the Bill in a very negative way, and have not understood the opportunities that exist for a modern approach to employment relations by ensuring that both unions and employers have the same capabilities, and that the highly productive, high-performance workplaces that we want can be achieved. We are going through a critical period of global competition, and the union modernisation fund will be a positive step towards ensuring that trade unions—

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. SPEAKER, pursuant to Order [25 March], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question accordingly negatived.

Order for Third Reading read.

9.51 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I shall begin by drawing attention to the Register of Members' Interests. Like all my hon. Friends, I am proud to be a member of a trade union. I am also proud of the fact that in Britain today there are more people in work than ever before—28 million. We have slashed long-term adult unemployment to below 140,000. In 1986, it stood at nearly 1.5 million. We have slashed long-term youth unemployment to about 20,000. Back in 1986, 300,000 young people were on the dole. We have lower unemployment rates than any other G7 economy, and in the last seven years 1.8 million new jobs have been created in our economy, seven out of 10 in the private sector. That has confounded all our critics, including Conservative Members who said that our policies to re-regulate the labour market would be a disaster for jobs. The opposite has proved to be the case, and the measures that we introduced in our first term are working well. We are building on those measures in the Bill.

Mr. Redwood: Can the Secretary of State tell us what has happened to manufacturing jobs since the Government took office? Does that not demonstrate just how much damage some of their regulations have caused?

Ms Hewitt: That is a bit much, coming from a former Minister in a Conservative Government who devastated manufacturing industry and manufacturing jobs in constituencies up and down the country and did not give a toss for the workers who were thrown out of work. I regret to say that, in many sectors, manufacturing employment has continued to fall. As the right hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware, there has been a global downturn, which has made life for manufacturing exporters exceedingly difficult. I am glad to say, however—and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman welcomes this—that manufacturing is now turning the corner. With a strong and stable economy, historically low interest rates, specific measures such as investment assistance and our wonderful Manufacturing Advisory Service, we are helping more manufacturing companies to become competitive. The right hon. Gentleman's party failed to provide such help.

Getting people into work is essential, especially after the unemployment created by the Conservative party, but far more is needed in the modern world. We must have the conditions that will create more good jobs, better jobs and better workplaces. We know that the best businesses in our country operate on the basis of partnership between management and the work force—partnership with a recognised trade union where there is one, but partnership in every case. Among the most important of the Bill's provisions are the measures on information and consultation. They give effect to the information and consultation directive but do so in a way that suits our particular circumstances in the United Kingdom. Our provisions on information and consultation will help to create, in larger workplaces, a culture of partnership in which employees are informed, involved and committed to the success of their business.

Mr. Djanogly: What the Secretary of State says is not reflected in the Bill. The fact is that under the Bill, all that information and consultation is to be done by statutory instrument. She has not said how consultation or the directive will be put into effect, and if she would like to say now how that will happen, I should be grateful.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman must surely notice that the Bill provides precisely the statutory authority that will bring information and consultation into effect and, in so doing, will end the absolute scandal that too many members of our work force have had to put up with: that of hearing from the radio in the morning, or, as in one notorious case, by text message to their mobile phone, that they are to lose their job. We will not put up with that. We have worked with the CBI and the TUC to agree a framework for the implementation of the information and consultation directive, and I very much welcome the fact that Digby Jones has said on that:

> "We have reached this agreement ... through constructive dialogue and discussion. It's exactly the spirit in which we all want new rules on information and consultation to operate in workplaces across Britain."

That approach with the social partners is a model of the approach already being used by the best businesses, which we want more of our businesses to adopt. I pay tribute to the work of both those organisations in reaching that agreement.

I also express my gratitude to hon. Members for their close interest in the Bill and the energy that they have displayed during its passage.

Mr. Bellingham: On both sides?

Ms Hewitt: There have been many constructive contributions, and I had the pleasure of reading the contributions that the hon. Gentleman made in Committee. I pay tribute to him for the spirit in which he moved, and then withdrew, several amendments. I also pay tribute to the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) for the excellent work that he has done in shepherding the Bill through.

We have had an extensive consultation process on the Bill, and we will continue to listen, particularly as we finalise some of the clauses that we have added more recently. We have never lost sight of the need to keep the costs to business to a minimum, and nothing that we have added to the Bill during its passage will add significantly to those costs.

I shall highlight the changes that we have made to the Bill since its introduction. First, we are absolutely clear that we will not tolerate intimidation or bullying by employers or, indeed, by trade unions during recognition ballots. We will not have in Britain the kind of union-busting tactics that I am afraid have become all too commonplace in the United States. They are, fortunately, rare in our country, but we have listened to concerns raised during the Bill's passage, and we have responded with the new clauses, moved by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, that have been added today.

Secondly, we are not prepared to allow racists to hide behind membership of a political party to infiltrate trade union ranks. Clauses now in the Bill provide greater scope, quite properly, and in a way that complies with the Human Rights Act 1998, to root out that pernicious element and to exclude and expel it from trade union membership.

Thirdly, we will not allow rogue employers or, indeed, trade unions to flout the rules on lawfully organised industrial action. I promised on Second Reading that we would look closely at the Friction Dynamics case. That case was not only unusual but, fortunately, unique, and as a result of our consideration of the experience of the Transport and General Workers Union members at Friction Dynamics we have now tightened the legal definitions so that we will not see a repeat of employees being locked out of their workplace while the employer pays little more than lip service—if it can even be called that—to their statutory obligations. Again, we have strengthened the Bill in that respect.

Fourthly, we recognise the valuable role of modern trade unions in the modern workplace. They play a crucial role in helping to raise productivity, skills levels and the quality of our businesses' output. They can be partners with business in creating high performance, high productivity workplaces. Those are the only kind of workplaces that have a long-term future in an increasingly competitive global environment.

The modernisation fund that we have just debated on Report will give trade unions targeted funding to help them keep up in the rapidly changing labour market, and to make step changes in the way in which they work. I want to add my assurances to those that my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South has given both this evening and in Committee: this is not money for trade union recruitment, or money that can be used for industrial action. Nor can it be used for the political purposes covered by the political funds, which are entirely separate, separately constituted by law, and cannot receive money from a trade union general fund.

As my hon. Friend said, we shall of course consult fully on the plans for the fund, in order to ensure a robust set of rules, proper procedures and accountability, and so on. We will draw on the excellent existing model of the partnership at work fund, through which an independent advisory board makes recommendations on bids for money. We will not pre-judge the consultation process, but that model certainly provides a transparent and accountable method of allocating funds. The modernisation fund will account for between £5 million and £10 million, spread over several years. It will help trade unions to plan better for the long term, to think more strategically and to contribute better to our long-term economic success as a multiracial and diverse society.

The Bill takes another important step towards accomplishing our vision of full and fulfilling employment, and it reinforces the framework of fair standards at work that we have established over the past five years. It builds on the vital achievements of the national minimum wage, which was recently increased again, protection for part-time workers, paid paternity leave, the doubling of the length of maternity leave, the new rights to family friendly working, and the trade union recognition to which I have referred. It also leaves untouched the fundamentals of the trade union recognition system that we put in place in our first term: the small firms threshold, the voting threshold and the voluntary agreements.

We consulted extensively on those arrangements before the enactment of the Employment Relations Act 1999, and we know from our review that they are working. They have significantly increased, and are continuing to increase, the number of workplaces and workers covered by collective agreements, thereby helping to protect those workers, and helping—even more importantly—to create the partnership at work that I spoke of earlier. Business and employees are happy with them, and the number of stoppages at work due to labour disputes is at a record low. There were a mere 133 stoppages in 2003—the lowest figure since records began in 1920. I cannot go back quite as far as 200 years, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor did recently, but it is a pretty good record, given the history of industrial relations in our country.

Mr. Djanogly: That record sounds excellent until one considers the number of unofficial days off for last year. On doing so, 2003 turns into the worst year since 1997.

Ms Hewitt: I notice that the hon. Gentleman does not make a comparison with the number of days lost under the Conservatives, especially in respect of the Royal Mail, for which I have a particular responsibility. Industrial relations are continuing to improve, despite all the scare stories from the Opposition at the time of the 1999 Act. We know that, crucial to success in a competitive global economy is the ability of Government, business, employees and their trade unions to work together on skills in high-performance workplaces and to ensure that we sustain the economic stability that has underpinned the extraordinary achievement on employment that we have delivered.

I believe that it is an excellent Bill and I commend it to the House.

10.5 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien : I draw the House's attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. I should also like to say that I draw on many years of experience in manufacturing industry, working positively and constructively with all those in the business in which I was engaged—including union members, union officials, individual employees and employers. It gives me great pleasure to thank my hon. Friends the Members for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) and for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), who served so diligently in Committee, and I pay tribute to the extraordinary hard work and scrutinising effectiveness of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham).

There are real and urgent problems facing British industry today, and it is against that background that we must debate Third Reading. Productivity has halved since 1997, the total trade deficit rose to an unprecedented £18.8 billion last year and the British Chambers of Commerce informs us that the cost of regulation has shot up by an astonishing £9 billion in the last 12 months alone. The annual cost of poor skills amounts to an estimated further £10 billion.

In that context, it speaks volumes about the priorities of the Government and the Secretary of State that we are not debating any of those vital issues, but another Employment Relations Bill, for which there is scant demand, least of all from those engaged at all levels working in British business. We know that there is little demand because the Bill arose from a Government-commissioned review of the Employment Relations Act 1999. According to the regulatory impact assessment published alongside the Bill,

"The main conclusions of the review are that the legislation is generally working well".

If the Government's own conclusion is that the current legislation is working well, is it not strange that they have decided to use primary legislation essentially to fine-tune an Act passed just four years earlier?

The Employment Relations Bill that we are debating today is not the Bill that we saw on Second Reading. It is not the Bill whose tepid endorsement from the CBI and others was based on relief at its basic insubstantiality and on what it did not contain rather than what it did. We voted against it on Second Reading because it was an unnecessary Bill in its own terms.

Precisely as I predicted in my Second Reading speech, the Bill has turned out to be a Christmas tree—an unadorned framework on which interest groups, specifically the unions, have been invited to hang their favourite baubles. Precisely because that was my original suspicion, I asked the Secretary of State on Second Reading whether she would "assure the House that additional measures will not be introduced by Government amendment, or conceded by them, with the exception of those that she has already flagged and on which we have had a constructive exchange"—[Official Report, 14 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 832.]

Let me place on record, before Labour Members attempt to make any potentially mischievous or even grossly misrepresentative points, that what was then flagged was the Government amendment introduced after Second Reading, which resulted in what is now clause 28, dealing with the exclusion and expulsion from trade unions of racists. We said then that we would consider that positively, particularly when we had a chance to explore the detail, because Conservative Members are equally determined to root out racism. However, the clause does not refer to the British National party, only to "a political party" and to "excluded conduct" of an individual. That could have been achieved either through union rules or, failing that, by a statutory instrument brought under the authority of the 1999 Act. It does not justify the Government in bringing in wholly new primary legislation.

The Secretary of State refused to give me the guarantee that I sought on introducing or conceding additional measures. Instead, we have seen a host of late amendments, a great many of which were tabled just five days ago in a deliberate attempt to downgrade the House's opportunities for scrutiny and for outside organisations such as the CBI, the British Chambers of Commerce, the Engineering Employers Federation, the Federation of Small Businesses, the Forum of Private Business and many others.

Let me say to all those who study the record—if asked, those who worked with me when I worked within a large unionised industry, would confirm it—that I am not, nor have ever been, anti-trade unions or anti-trade unionists.

Because this is a short debate, I have time to focus only on the most scandalous of the late amendments—the Government's bung to the unions. The regulatory impact assessment accompanying the Bill states that the quantified benefit to the unions is between £75,000 and £108,000. The RIA was signed off on 3 December 2003. On 10 February 2004, the Minister for Employment Relations, Competition and Consumers announced that he was tabling a new clause that would "make funds available to independent trade unions and federations of trade unions to modernise their operations."

He also said that he envisaged that

"the size of the fund would be in the region of £5 million—£10 million in total, with expenditure spread over several years, probably beginning in 2005–06."—[Official Report, 10 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 67WS.]

That happens to coincide with what we understand to be the £5 million to £10 million that the unions, from the hard-won earnings of trade unionists, give to the Labour party. Such a fundamental alteration to the Bill, so vaguely phrased and coming after the signing off of the RIA, constitutes a total abuse of the parliamentary process.

Furthermore, it is evident that the Government have proposed this measure at great, uncapped cost to the taxpayer, having given no thought to the nature, structure, mandate or time limit of the so-called union modernisation fund.

Mr. Redwood : Will my hon. Friend comment on how wide-ranging clause 46 is? As I understand it, the money can be applied for any existing purpose or any new, unspecified purpose. It could not be any wider.

Mr. O'Brien: My right hon. Friend puts his finger on the inadequate opportunity that the House has had to scrutinise the proposal. The proposal is vague, it was introduced after Second Reading and I am sure that the other place will wish to scrutinise it with great care and consideration.

If I am wrong in what I have said, I invite the Secretary of State to intervene to correct me. Would she care to clarify the expenditure limit of the fund? Or will she confirm that effectively it has none? What is the time limit of the fund? Or will she have to confirm that it has none? As the Government know, it is not possible to amend a new clause in Committee. Why are the Government so reticent about providing a clear and accountable definition? Is it all part of the Government's embarrassed desire to avoid spelling out the extent of the bung?

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Does my hon. Friend also accept that this case is a clear illustration of the need for some form of external, objective audit of regulatory impact assessments? It is a classic case of the regulators assessing their own performance, being vague and, in this instance, virtually negligent in so doing.

Mr. O'Brien: My hon. Friend anticipates my tribute to his ten-minute Bill on the issue, to which the Government have paid no attention. It would ensure a degree of independence and impartiality so that the Government could not up the benefits of a Bill but seek to diminish the costs.

What is the justification for subsidising union modernisation but not a charity or voluntary organisation? Come to think of it, what is the Secretary of State's definition of modernisation, besides its habitual use by new Labour to mask yet again its absence of principle? It defines everything it sees as rotten so that it can justify the use of precious parliamentary time on it as necessary and useful. What processes will the Secretary of State put in place to ensure that the unlimited quantity of money goes exclusively towards the purposes of modernisation, whatever they may be? I am not surprised that we have heard no satisfactory answers to any of those questions. What is clear is that the only calculation that the Government have made is a cost-benefit analysis of throwing a sop to their friends and paymasters in an attempt to tame them ahead of the general election. That is the real regulatory impact assessment at the front of ministerial minds, not the version that they have provided for display in the Library.

I note that the Government have made great play of the support of the CBI for the Bill. However, the CBI has made clear its views on the union modernisation fund, which was of course introduced after Second Reading and after it had given its approval to the contents of the Bill. The CBI believes that "the Government should not subsidise inefficient unions or union recruitment campaigns through its proposed union modernisation fund."

The Minister attempted to suggest that such purposes have been excluded, but the Government have not defined what is included. Lack of precise definition is part of the problem. The CBI also says:

"It is disappointing that the Government has taken this step given the low incidence of union membership in both the private and public sectors."

That gives rise to the question of how much information the Government provided about the amendment and how much consultation took place between the Government and the CBI. Was it about as much as the Chancellor provided for the civil servants he summarily dismissed in his Budget address?

The Secretary of State has rightly expressed her opposition to employees being sacked by text message, but what about a Government desperate to stay on-message on tackling public sector waste, which the Chancellor has now admitted amounts to £20 billion of taxpayers' money? I invite the Secretary of State to have a quiet word with her right hon. Friend the Chancellor about the importance of leading by example in a "no surprises" culture in the workplace. Does she not feel even a tiny pang of conscience, given her Under-Secretary's edict? On 2 December, in a DTI press release, he said:

"I want to see an end to the climate where people only hear out of the blue about job losses from the media, or by text message. I want to see a "no surprises" culture at work where employers and employees discuss common ground and find solutions to mutual problems."

Only yesterday, however, we learned in The Sunday Telegraph that the Government are to slash or relocate at least 1,500 jobs in an overhaul of the Department of Trade and Industry. It reported:

"The headcount at the DTI's headquarters will be reduced by a third, with about 650 jobs cut and around 850 relocated to the regions."

Ms Hewitt: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that we have been talking to our trade unions for several months about our plans to make our work force more efficient and to relocate some of our jobs.

Mr. O'Brien: It may be of some comfort to know that a fairly Chancellor-led surprise announcement was actually in train and that there were discussions with what the Secretary of State calls "our trade unions" rather than "the trade unions", which would be a more proper way of putting it. That is important.

Despite the Secretary of State's attempt to reassure us, it is equally important that, when the Government issue announcements about job cuts in the public sector, including the way that they slip out news about sackings from her own Department, they should be judged by their deeds. At the very least, they should adopt for their Departments the standards that she seeks to impose through the Bill on other employers, especially those in the private sector who are risk takers as opposed to the non-wealth-creating public sector—[Interruption.] Labour Members hate hearing that. They do not like to be rumbled, because the Bill is an effort to dress up something to do with their electoral advantage, as they define it, rather than a true concern for good business, good employment and good, safe jobs.

The other highly flawed provision in the Bill is the incorporation of the information and consultation directive in UK law. In that regard, I refer again to the regulatory impact assessment published in conjunction with the Bill. Incidentally, I make no apologies for my repeated references to the impact of regulation. On the Opposition Benches, we take that very seriously indeed, although I confess that I would have more faith in the reliability of RIAs if even one burdensome regulation had been aborted as a result of that procedure. I asked the Secretary of State about that in a written question, but she relied on her Cabinet Office colleague, who declined to give even one such example. The Minister for the Cabinet Office stated:

"There are no cross-government figures on the number of RIAs that resulted in decisions not to proceed with new regulations."—[Official Report, 2 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 715W.]

Even the tentative quantification of the RIA cannot disguise the fact that the one-off costs to business of implementing the measure will be £45 million and that the recurring annual costs will be £46 million. This single measure alone accounts for more than 75 per cent. of the recurring regulatory costs of the entire Employment Relations Act 1999, which was itself a costly piece of legislation for British business. I hope that the Secretary of State will reconsider the belief, which she expressed on Second Reading, that the costs of the Bill to employers are broadly "insignificant". In her speech this evening, she said that the amendments subsequently proposed would not add a significant cost to businesses.

Ms Hewitt: I am puzzled. I understand that the hon. Gentleman is against the union modernisation fund; that is a clear dividing line. But is he also telling the House that he is against the information and consultation provisions?

Mr. O'Brien: Perhaps the Secretary of State should hold her breath. I am just about to develop why the Government have chosen to implement the information and consultation directive in a form much broader than was sought in respect of its imposition on this country. As the director general of the CBI has noted, the directive is "a poor piece of EU legislation".

The fact that the Government lack the will and the influence in Brussels to refine an evidently crude directive at its inception is therefore regrettable, as is their lack of a requirement for a full regulatory impact assessment of that or any other EU regulation while it is being drawn up—despite the fact that it is at that stage that the Government can do most to influence a directive's nature and outcome. Theirs is an oddly relaxed attitude, given that about 40 per cent. of UK regulations that originate in Brussels are more costly to British business than those that originate in this place.

Even more galling is the way in which the Government manage to make the worst of a bad situation by transcribing burdensome directives into UK law with disproportionate zeal. There is no reason why the information and consultation directive should not have been introduced via a statutory instrument—indeed, it is unusual to introduce such a directive by primary legislation and to give the Secretary of State significant powers to "make any provision which appears . . . to be necessary or expedient".

Why have the Government taken such wide-ranging powers when they did not want the directive in the first place? Lord Sainsbury of Turville—a DTI Minister—is on the record as saying that "a general framework for informing and consulting employees in the European Community . . . is difficult to reconcile with subsidiarity and would cut across member state traditions to no benefit."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 5 March 2001; Vol. 623, c. WA 14.]

If the Government are capable of so vigorously—to the tune of £45 million a year—gold-plating legislation of which they do not even approve, it is terrifying to consider how they implement regulation that they endorse. That goes some way to explaining the BCC figure I mentioned earlier that the cost of regulation on British business has rocketed by £9 billion in the past 12 months alone.

What began as a non-Bill has ended up as a stealth Bill, which will serve to strengthen the unions' power and the Labour party's purported links to them, and to weaken both British business and Parliament. It is an abuse of taxpayers' money and of the scrutiny procedures of this House. One of the few positive notes that can be struck is that it represents a powerful and definitive argument for the two excellent ten-minute Bills recently presented by Back-Bench Members of the official Opposition, my hon. Friends the Members for Huntingdon and for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman).

The Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon was designed to eradicate precisely the thoughtless bureaucratic gold-plating of EU directives that the Bill embodies in relation to the information and consultation directive. The European Communities (Deregulation) Bill declares that provisions of regulations will not have to be enforced if it can be proved that they will impose higher compliance costs or a heavier sanction for failure to comply than in other EU member states. That is a constructive and commendable approach to over-burdensome EU regulation, and any Government interested in our British national interest should take my hon. Friend's Bill seriously.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): My hon. Friend is delivering a racy and intoxicating speech to which I hope I can add. Does he agree that it is most regrettable that the pioneering stance on sunset regulation adopted by the right hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers) when he was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, as reflected in the Electronic Communications Act 2000, has since been abandoned and the Government are now adopting a tepid and reactionary attitude that fails to give the proper opportunity to minimise regulation in the way that the example of the United States teaches us is beneficial to industry and commerce?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is nice to know that a speech can be intoxicating, although I assure the House that, at this stage of the day, I have not had the benefit of anything intoxicating to help me along. More important, he can be reassured that a presumption in favour of sunset clauses is a plank in the official Opposition's proposals to aid the British economy and British business, and that presumption will not be ditched for the sake of expediency.

The Government ignored the Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon. Yet again, they displayed their indifference to the needs of British business. With reference to the disgraceful way in which the union modernisation fund was announced, it is clear that the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells of a system of post-implementation audits for RIAs, as set out in his Regulatory Impact Assessments (Audits) Bill, would prevent Ministers from getting away with the shameful practice of signing off RIAs, only to table amendments later that impose potentially vast additional costs on the taxpayer. Indeed, my hon. Friend also provided for the fact that those who promote a Bill and who argue in favour of its benefits cannot be expected to be trusted to be impartial about the costs. Again, there was no squeak of interest from the Secretary of State or her Government colleagues. I know that my colleagues in the other place will be interested in pursuing all these points.

As presented on Second Reading, the Bill was unnecessary. Now, as predicted by the Opposition and feared by British business, it has become costly, nannying, preachy and burdensome. It is highly unlikely that it will influence a few bad employers. It will increase burdens on already good employers and give comfort to the few bad unions. The Bill is a product of the distorted priorities of those who sponsored it—a Government who are desperate to curry favour with their paymaster unions and a Department that is structurally indifferent to the flexible and fair needs of British business and wealth-creating small businesses, especially those employing fewer than 50 people. Above all, it is not even-handed between employer and employee. Had we been able to debate amendment No. 7, I know that that issue would have been taken seriously in another place. It is appropriately known as the Miller amendment.

It is no accident that the resource budget for employment relations of the Department of Trade and Industry has more than tripled since 1998, while the allocation for innovation has fallen by 7 per cent. over the same period. It is a matter of fact that the Secretary of State, like her Department, is on the side of the regulators and against enterprising British entrepreneurs and innovators. Unless and until there is a re-evaluation of the purpose and priorities of the Department, I believe that businesses will continue to suffer. The Bill is the latest in a litany of measures that the Government have introduced to burden British business. Unless it is defeated this evening—I urge my colleagues and all other Members to join me in the No Lobby—it will sit as another glaring indictment on the charge sheet against this Labour Government and this Secretary of State.

Jim Sheridan: It is unfortunate that, once again, those who spoke from the Front Benches took most of the time that was allocated to an important debate.

As a long-standing member of the Transport and General Workers Union, I am proud of the Government for introducing legislation that protects and enhances the role of trade unions. I would argue that another term of Conservative government would have sounded the death knell for trade unions. In that event, we would have been talking today about the reinvigoration of trade unions instead of helping them to expand.

The T and G was much involved in my education and assisted me in getting to this place, for which I am extremely grateful. Many Labour Members have experience of working through the trade union movement and in so doing getting their education. There is an argument that we need more people of the same background and experience in the House if it is to be representative of the work force.

The most chilling comment that I heard during the debate came from the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman. He said that employees' performance could be affected if they had to attend trade union meetings.

Mr. Bellingham: I was making the point that when more than one member of staff went consistently to meetings—perhaps three, four, five or six meetings—that could affect performance, particularly in relation to health and safety.

Jim Sheridan: I thank the hon. Gentleman, but it was chilling to hear him say that the performance of employees could be affected if they had to attend a trade union meeting. Many members of the Labour party have experience of attending trade union meetings and of being discriminated against because they did so. Many of them are still on the dole as a result of being blacklisted. They are still looking for a job. In some instances, that is the result of the legislation that the Tory Government brought in.

Not much mention has been made of the foot soldiers in the trade union movement—shop stewards. There are young shop stewards, and I have in mind particularly the young females in the trade union movement, which is trying to encourage more women to become representatives. That is something that the Labour party would welcome.

I would put employers into three categories. There is the progressive employer who has nothing to fear from the Bill. The company that I have recently left is already engaged in consulting and helping trade unions, especially with training. It offers resources to help shop stewards to be trained. It recognises that that adds value to the company and helps to increase productivity. There is no problem with that.

Secondly, there are negative employers who wish to take advantage of inexperienced young shop stewards. They keep them waiting in corridors. They misinform them and treat them as idiots. Finally, there is the altruistic employer, whose attitude is, "If you do what you're told, if you're a good boy or a good girl, you'll be here for ever. Just do what I tell you." In my experience of working with the trade unions, I have never yet met a bad employer. I look forward to the day when I do.

On the modernisation fund, it is only right that trade unions should be given money to enable employees to negotiate on a level playing field with employers.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): On the money going to modernise trade unions, I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that it is no surprise to us that the Tories were against that. They are always anti-union and always will be. Is he as surprised as I am that the Liberal Democrats and the Scottish nationalists, who claim to be friends of the trade union movement, abstained or voted against it?

Jim Sheridan: My hon. Friend makes a good point. As a former president of Unison, the public services union, she knows what she is talking about. She is right. In my area, Renfrewshire, the Liberals claim to be the allies of the trade unions, but when it comes to giving the trade unions the resources to do the job, what do the Liberals do? They vote against it. The SNP say they stand up for Scotland. Where were they when it came to resources for the trade unions? They were not here. They could not be bothered to turn up. That explains why the people of Scotland should reject the nationalists, and why people throughout Britain should reject the Liberals.

Negotiations on pensions are complex, as are negotiations on health and safety. It is important that we have proper health and safety legislation that shop stewards and health and safety representatives are aware of and can deal with. We need people to know what employment law is about and how to relate that to the members. The same applies to company law. I know that many on the Opposition Benches do not understand why shop stewards should be involved with company law. They would rather keep that for the lawyers and the courtrooms. On redundancy packages and productivity pay, why should people not receive the best advice?

It would be remiss of me not to mention gangmasters. In that connection I pay tribute to the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk for his assistance and for recognising that legislation is needed to stop people being exploited by unscrupulous gangmasters, especially in agriculture. A private Member's Bill is going through the House and I hope that, with the support of hon. Members of all parties, it will become law.

We have tried voluntary codes and we have tried free markets, but they have not worked, so we need to try something else. Legislation is not a panacea for all the inequalities in the workplace, but it will go a long way towards stopping them. Effective employment legislation is needed particularly in agriculture, where current practice is nothing more than modern slavery and should be outlawed at every level. In addition to effective legislation, we need ministerial responsibility and financial resources to deal with unscrupulous employers.

Mr. Djanogly: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Jim Sheridan: My nipples are about to explode in anticipation of what the hon. Gentleman has to say.

Mr. Djanogly: Does not the hon. Gentleman recognise that the Bill is about squashing individual rights? We have the bosses getting together with the unions, and it is back to the 1950s. The people who suffer are individuals who want to have their own say.

Jim Sheridan: The Bill is about affording people the right to decent work and to dignity at work. When I spent time with the hon. Gentleman in Committee, it was nostalgic to hear him talk about trade unions, particularly when he talked about the 70s, 80s and 90s. Perhaps he was not around at that time, and he was basing his comments on what his parents or somebody else has told him. It was definitely nostalgic to listen to him talk about trade unions, his knowledge of which is somewhat limited.

[Jim Sheridan]

It being four hours after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to Order [25 March], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you know, the time constraints meant that you were not able to call me in the debate on Third Reading. I make no complaint about that—I appreciate the rules of the House. However, that means that, in relation to a programmed debate, our reasons for supporting a Bill and our qualifications are not on the record. Secondly, I wonder whether you and/or Mr. Speaker could review the speaking rules for programmed and timetabled Bills to ensure that all major opinions in the House are properly heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I sympathise with the circumstances in which the hon. Gentleman found himself. The Chair always nurses the hope on occasions when time is limited that hon. Members will somehow share out the time in a way that satisfies all points of view. Sometimes the Chair's hopes are not fulfilled.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it not be useful on such occasions if the party that complained did not support the programme motion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should not try to draw the Chair into a matter of debate.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together motions 3 and 4.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Northern Ireland Act 2000 (Modification) Order 2004, which was laid before this House on 4th March, be approved.—[Paul Clark.]

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

That the draft National Minimum Wage Regulations 1999 (Amendment) Regulations 2004, which were laid before this House on 18th March, be approved.—[Paul Clark.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN UNION DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

REVIEW OF THE WORKING TIME DIRECTIVE

That this House takes note of the European Union Document No.5188/04, Commission Communication on the re-examination of Directive 93/104/EC concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time; welcomes the review; supports the retention of the opt-out to the working time limit; and urges that a solution to the problems caused by the European Court of Justice cases of SiMAP and Jaeger is found.—[Paul Clark.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Ordered,

That the Pet Travel Scheme (Pilot Arrangements) (England) (Amendment) Order 2004 (S.I., 2004, No.828) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Paul Clark.]

Census 1911

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Paul Clark.]

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I fully appreciate that the subject of tonight's Adjournment debate might not feature in the editorial columns of tomorrow's newspapers, notwithstanding the fact that 1911 was a vintage year, when Lloyd George introduced old age pensions in his "people's Budget". However, I have received representations on the matter from several constituents. They are generally people who are interested in tracing their family histories and keen for the records to be brought into the public domain to assist that. I know that other hon. Members will have been contacted by constituents in similar circumstances. Indeed, only last week, I tabled early-day motion 871 on the release of the 1911 census data and it has already received 28 signatures from hon. Members of all parties.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) who has been very supportive and I am pleased that several hon. Friends, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who chairs the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs, are present.

The Minister will know about the phenomenal interest that was generated by the release of the 1901 census records in January 2002. He will also know that demand for the information was so great that 1.2 million people were trying to access the internet site that contained the records every hour. That somewhat outstripped the initial forecasts of 1.2 million users a day. That unforeseen demand resulted in the site's withdrawal on 7 January 2002, some five days after its launch. A full service was resumed 11 months later on 21 November. Whatever the Minister thinks about the release date for the records, I hope he will accept that when the 1911 census data are released, it must be done much more effectively.

First, I want to consider the period of closure—the time that must pass before the data are released. The Lord Chancellor recently advised an hon. Member that the period of census closure in Britain is normally 100 years. Only six out of the 15 pre-1910 United Kingdom censuses have been closed for 100 years. The details of nine out of 15 have been released after less than 90 years. The average closure period for censuses in Britain is 80 years and, according to the national archives in Dublin, records of the 1911 census in Northern Ireland were released in 1960, some 49 years after closure.

Of course, I accept that the situation north of the border is now devolved, but it has become apparent to me through my correspondence with the General Register Office for Scotland that, in these matters, the General Registrar for Scotland will take the same line on the release of personal information as his colleagues in England.

I do not wish to second-guess what the Minister will say tonight, but he will be aware that I have already tabled a number of parliamentary questions on this subject and I think that I can glean a fair idea from the answer that I received from the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) on 10 December 2003, in which he stated:

"The 1911 census returns, now in the custody of the National Archives, are currently closed for 100 years by the Lord Chancellor's Instrument no. 12 of 1966, on the grounds that the information was supplied in strict confidence."—[Official Report, 10 December 2003; Vol. 415, c. 457W.]

Before the Minister restates that position tonight, it might be useful to examine the legal basis for that view, to have a brief look at some of the financial benefits that could result from an alternative approach, and to consider the situation that pertains in the Republic of Ireland.

I shall turn first to the question of the legal basis. The principal point is that the original guarantee given to those who completed the 1911 census gave no time guarantee for the duration before which the records would be made public. The confidentiality assurances that were given to people in 1911 were outlined in a written answer that I received on 18 December. Those assurances stated:

"'The contents of the Schedule will be treated as confidential. Strict care will be taken that no information is disclosed with regard to individual persons. The returns are not to be used for proof of age, as in connection with Old Age Pensions, or for any other purpose than the preparation of Statistical Tables.'"—[Official Report, 18 December 2003; Vol. 415, c. 1112W.]

On a strict construction of that, one might say that no census would ever be released. The Government are clearly of the view, however, that that guarantee does not prevent the release of documents after a significant period has elapsed. That period is at the Lord Chancellor's discretion, and to hide behind the idea that we are keeping to a time guarantee given to those who completed census returns is slightly less than accurate. The 2001 census, for example, stated explicitly that records would be held confidentially for 100 years, but the situation in 1911 was very different.

The Lord Chancellor's Instrument No. 12 of 1966 established the 100-year embargo rule. Prior to that, the delay in making records public had been much shorter. For example, the 1841 and 1851 records for England and Wales were both released in 1912. Scottish records were also held for less than 100 years. The 1891 Scottish returns, for instance, were made public after a delay of only 64 years. Given that the release of returns after 50 to 80 years was the practice in the first half of the last century, that no confidentiality time period was given on the 1911 census and that the Lord Chancellor's Instrument No. 12 of 1966 was 55 years away at that point, I would be very surprised if anyone who participated in that census really believed that their return would be held for exactly 100 years and not a day less. What is more, section 5(1) of the Public Records Act 1958 provides for the general release of records after 50 years, and that was reduced to 30 years in 1967. The Lord Chancellor has the power to release the records early. The only question is whether he wants to.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): I have a constituent who would like me to ask a question about the release of census records in Scotland, but how can I do that as an English MP?

Mr. Carmichael: If the hon. Gentleman wants to enter into correspondence with the Registrar General for Scotland, my experience is that the Registrar General will be more than happy to help. Indeed, when the hon. Gentleman reads the earlier part of my speech in Hansard tomorrow—I know he was unable to be here for the start of it, when I referred to him—he will see that I have already explored with the Registrar General the question of release in Scotland. The approach that he takes is that it will be largely the same as that in the rest of the United Kingdom.

As a Member from a fiscally responsible party, I always endeavour to ensure that any call I make for Government action is fully costed. The good news for the Government in relation to this call is that such action would increase revenue flows to the Treasury. According to the National Audit Office report on the release of the 1901 census, "Unlocking the Past: the 1901 Census Online", the internet site allowing access to the England and Wales records generated revenues of £4.5 million by 31 October 2003. Of course, the fear is that the longer the 1911 census is not available to the public, the more revenue-raising potential will decline.

The release of the 1901 census was more successful in Scotland than in England and Wales. There were not the same problems of over-demand for information leading to website failure. The NAO report suggests that that was the case for two reasons: an up-front charge for access to the Scottish website and the progressive release of data on microfilm before its release online. I hesitate to call on the Government to increase charges for access to records, especially given the revenues made without such charges for the England and Wales records, but I ask the Minister seriously to consider the release of the data on microfilm ahead of online release. If the Government are to stick rigidly to the 2012 date, that would be welcomed by many genealogists and would assist with an effective release of the records so that additional delays, as happened in 2002, would not occur again.

In 1901 and 1911, the whole of Ireland was part of the United Kingdom. Censuses were carried out there along similar lines to those in England, Scotland and Wales. The 1901 Irish census returns have been available in the Republic on film since 1971, and the 1911 census returns since 2000. Does the Minister not think it strange that the 1901 Irish records were available on film in Dublin some 30 years before the Public Record Office in Northern Ireland released microfilms and that while there is already access to the 1911 records in the south, the north of Ireland will have to wait another eight years?

I am keen that the Minister should have adequate time to reply to the points that I have raised, so I shall make one final substantive comment. The more I have looked into the matter, the more I have realised that it comes down to a question of freedom of information and the public interest on the one hand and the right of privacy given to individual citizens on the other. In this case, the right of the people who are researching their family histories—genealogists—has to be balanced against the right of people who participated in the 1911 census to have their responses kept confidential. On this matter, I gently suggest to the Minister that the Government have so far got the balance wrong.

[Mr. Carmichael]

In a recent letter to me, the Registrar General for Scotland stated:

"Ideally . . . we would want to wait until the death of the last person who had appeared in the census" before making the details public. He continued:

"While that would be impractical, the 100 year milestone ensures that few will still be alive. With today's greater longevity, a shorter milestone (say, 90 years) would substantially increase the number of survivors who might object to their data being released."

Today, millions of genealogists are keen to see the 1911 census. It carried no guarantee of confidentiality for a set period and it was taken when records were normally released after 60 to 80 years. What is more, the Lord Chancellor has the power to determine that it can be released before 2012, and the Irish equivalent, which was taken by the UK Government, is already available.

Early release would generate money for the poor, cash-strapped Chancellor, so what is the reason for having to wait? Is there a vast lobby of 93-year-old people out there who are desperate for us not to know the contents of their census return—their date of birth and their parents' names, addresses and occupations? I think not. I hope that the Minister has a much better explanation for us than that.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I thank the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) for raising the 1911 census for England and Wales. The Government welcome the opportunity to have a constructive debate on a complicated issue, which is to my mind essentially a question of balancing the access interests of family and other historians who wish to consult census returns to further their research against the privacy rights accorded to citizens when they provided personal information in their census returns. I am glad that he acknowledged that balance towards the end of his comments. I stress that tonight's debate is about England and Wales, since the Scottish census is the responsibility of the Scottish Parliament.

In recent years, many people have taken up family history for the first time and with a passion, as many key documentary sources have become available over the internet. The Government recognise that the pursuit of family history is very far from being a marginal leisure interest, as it has sometimes rather unfairly been regarded in the past. It fulfils two profound needs: the development of a sense of family, community and personal identity to provide a secure anchor for people in a sometimes rather anonymous modern world; and the satisfaction of a growing curiosity about the past. In the case of the United Kingdom, there is the additional desire on the part of family historians scattered across the globe to keep alive the link with the country from which their ancestors came.

The Government have positively encouraged family historians by providing much easier access via the internet to the many records created by Government bodies that can assist family history research. That fits in well with the wider "Modernising Government" agenda to make major public services available online, so that citizens can use those services in ways and at times that are convenient to them.

In the archival world, the national archive has made digital images of its major collection of wills available over the internet, and they are a crucial source for family historians stretching over 500 years. The archive runs an online family history consortium of Departments and other public bodies, which provides detailed guidance and signposts for those new to the subject. It also provides more than 200,000 original images about the experience of immigration into the UK since the mid-19th century, to attract new users to archives, as part of the Government's social inclusion agenda.

We are well aware that not everyone wishes to, or can afford to, install a personal computer in their homes. That is why we revived this country's libraries by providing free access to computer terminals as part of a national information network, in addition to making them more animated places offering a focus for a wide range of community activities. By the end of this year, all the UK's more than 4,000 libraries will be linked to the internet as learning and access centres. All Members will be pleased to see their libraries revived around the country.

In the last few years, there has been an explosion of interest in history, as the popularity of television programmes presented by Simon Schama, David Starkey and others indicates. Gone for ever are the days when history was the preserve of academic scholars in a few ivory-tower universities. The Government have played a full part in that transformation by increasing funding for museums, especially in the regions, and by abolishing entry charges, which has led to an increase in the number of people visiting museums. In the first year of the free access policy, which was introduced in late 2001, there were 5.3 million extra visits to museums, and last year there were an additional 5.6 million. The record is clear. There is support for libraries, museums and online services, and for those who want to understand not just the country's history but their own family histories.

When decisions are made about the provision of access to personally sensitive information, either in original documents or in digital copies of them, the interests of researchers are not the only factor to be taken into account. There is sometimes a danger of our being swept along in our enthusiasm to make more material available, without acknowledging that the individuals who supplied personal information also have important rights. Far from favouring a nanny state in which all decisions are made by a Government who know best, we wish to build a mature relationship between state and citizen that is based on trust. In building that trust, the Government need to adopt a careful and discriminating approach to the collection of personal information, and to demonstrate that they will use that information responsibly. In short, the Government believe that the right to privacy, and to the confidentiality of sensitive personal information, is every bit as important in a flourishing democratic society as the right of access to that information.The release of the 1911 census provides one example of the need to strike a reasonable balance between the access rights of some citizens and the privacy rights of others.

Mr. Carmichael: I have a straightforward question. It is clear from the figures that I gave the Minister that the balance has been struck differently in the past. What has changed?

Mr. Lammy: I shall explain that shortly, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me. I can say, however, that on the last five or six occasions in the last century, the Government maintained the 100-year rule. For the 19th century, they reduced the period, but that was because there was a problem relating to pension entitlement. Individuals needed access to the census, and the Government took an interest in what was a national issue.

It is also important to note what was on the census form at that time. As the hon. Gentleman will know, census forms have become more complex and ask more searching questions than they used to. The 1911 census form asked sensitive questions for the first time. We appreciate the importance to many people of gaining access to census records as a way of starting, or continuing to pursue, their family history research. However, in the case of the 1911 census that must be weighed against the undertaking given to householders at the time in the following emphatic terms:

"The contents of the Schedule will be treated as confidential. Strict care will be taken that no information is disclosed with regard to individual persons".

The hon. Gentleman says that no 100-year rule was mentioned, but another interpretation of that confidentiality was that it should be in perpetuity. Some countries destroy their censuses after a reasonable period to ensure confidentiality; we have used the 100-year rule as an alternative. We were giving a remarkably categorical assurance in 1911. The Government believe that it must be taken very seriously indeed, especially because at the time it was generally interpreted as having no expiry date.

The hon. Gentleman has noted that the average time that elapsed between the taking of censuses in England, Wales and Scotland before 1911 and their public release was only 80 years, but there was a marked tendency for census forms in the 20th century to ask detailed questions. For example, the 1911 census introduced a question on fertility for the first time. If the average is to constitute any guide, we must be careful to compare like with like. Closer examination reveals that the hon. Gentleman's average of 80 years is heavily weighted towards 19th century censuses, which asked individuals for fewer details than later censuses. Censuses up to 1851 were made publicly available in the earlier 20th century because they often constituted the only proof of age, and therefore the only proof of entitlement to pensions, which were first provided by the state in 1908. Compared with later censuses, the 1841 and 1851 censuses asked for only basic personal information. Today, the state has a vast array of documentation relating to each citizen, and no one would seriously argue that access to the census returns is still necessary to establish proof of age.

The legislative and social context in which censuses are conducted has changed enormously since the early 20th century. Another consideration is that average life expectancy has increased considerably during the past 150 years, so the closure period needed to ensure that sensitive personal information is not released within the lifetime of most individuals has correspondingly lengthened. For those reasons, the argument based on past averages of censuses more than 100 years old is not, in the end, persuasive.

Mr. Carmichael: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way; he has been very generous with his time. Is he, then, critical of the Government of the Republic of Ireland for releasing information from the 1911 census relating to people in Northern Ireland? As I said, that information is already in the public domain. Have the Government received any complaints from people in Northern Ireland about the release of the information relating to them?

Mr. Lammy: In Northern Ireland, again, certain pension issues arose, which made that action necessary.

It is sometimes suggested that the confidentiality undertaking given in 1911 can now be set aside because most, although by no means all, the people mentioned in those returns are now dead. However, if that view prevailed, the damaging effects on future nationwide censuses could be considerable. In 1966, the then Lord Chancellor signed an instrument, under section 5(1) of the Public Records Act 1958, closing all decennial census records for 100 years on the grounds that the information was supplied in confidence, and that its disclosure would constitute a breach of good faith. In 1981, the confidentiality assurance on the census forms was made even more explicit, and mentioned the 100-year closure period. The form for the most recent census, in 2001, included the following unequivocal statement:

"The information you provide is protected by law and is treated in strict confidence. The information is only used for statistical purposes, and anyone using or disclosing Census information improperly will be liable to prosecution. Census forms will be held securely. Under the current terms of the Public Records Act 1958, the data will be treated as confidential for a period of 100 years."

The primary purpose of the census is to compile statistics about the population so that the Government can, for example, take full account of rapidly changing demographics in order to make necessary provision for public services. Filling in the census is compulsory, and those who refuse to fill the forms in may be prosecuted. However, the plain fact of the matter is that the census will not be a successful information-gathering exercise if it is not generally acceptable to the public at large. We know from experience that many members of the public are concerned about the confidentiality of a census and the uses to which the information is put. The hon. Gentleman will know that there is debate in the House about certain aspects of the 2001 census, and it is important that we encourage Members to have such debates. It is right that we protect confidentiality in striking the necessary balance.

If the Government were suddenly to reduce the closure period of 100 years for the 1911 census, seeds of doubt would inevitably be sown in the public's mind about the strength of the explicit assurance that later census returns will be closed for 100 years. No Government can afford to deprive themselves of the wealth of socio-economic data that contemporary censuses provide. The Government therefore believe that maintaining the security and confidentiality of the information that citizens supply about themselves in their census returns is of paramount importance. It is strongly in the national interest that public confidence in these confidentiality assurances be maintained.

That is the fundamental reason why the Lord Chancellor does not intend to reconsider the 100-year closure period established in 1966. Since then, successive Governments have reaffirmed the position in the undertakings printed on census forms since 1981, in the 1993 White Paper on open government and in the White Paper on the 2001 census. It is for that reason that I am unable, I am afraid, to accept the case that the hon. Gentleman has made, although I am grateful to him for bringing this issue to the House's attention this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-one minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

4th Geneva Convention

1. Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): What sanctions are available to the UK in response to unlawful killings by an occupying power (a) under the terms of the 4th Geneva Convention and (b) otherwise. [164108]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): There is no specific sanction provided for under the 4th Geneva convention or otherwise but we have repeatedly made our concerns known at national and EU level to the Government of Israel about their policy of so-called targeted killings, which we consider to be unlawful.

Mr. Blunt: Before the killing of Sheikh Yassin and three people in his immediate vicinity, B'Tselem, the Israeli information centre for human rights—the Foreign Office accepts its figures as accurate—recorded that since September 2000, 135 Palestinians have been extra-judicially executed by Israel, and that in the course of those assassinations another 90 Palestinians were killed, including 28 children. The Government have repeatedly made it clear that that policy is illegal. Do they accept that the policy is not only criminal, but self-defeating? How many more murdered people will it take for them to attempt to fulfil their obligations under articles 146 and 147 of the convention? Surely it is incumbent on them to use other sanctions against the Israeli Government to get them to pursue a policy that is lawful, moral and much more likely to reverse the spiral of hatred and violence.

Mr. Straw: Our position on those so-called assassinations—straightforward killings—is the same as the hon. Gentleman's, and it is shared by others on both sides of the House. The killings are unlawful, unjustified and self-defeating, and they damage the case that Israel makes in the world. The fact that the killings led to the deaths of not only those whom Israel holds responsible for terrorism, but entirely innocent bystanders, including children, simply emphasises the unlawful nature of that approach, and its counter-productive effect. We will continue to make our position clear to the Government of Israel in representations, which we continually make both bilaterally and through the European Union.

So far as peace is concerned, the best way to secure a peaceful settlement to that long-standing and terrible conflict is by encouraging and cajoling all parties to return to the pathway set out in the road map. It is the only pathway to peace, and, despite the difficulties, we will continue to do our best to ensure that the parties pursue it.

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): Unlawful killings are only one aspect of Israel's breach of the 4th Geneva convention: torture is commonplace; residents are sealed off; land is confiscated; and houses are demolished—I saw all that in the Gaza strip. Do the Government have the political will to consider sanctions at some point—all other measures have failed—to try to get Israel to uphold the 4th Geneva convention?

Mr. Straw: We pursue the enforcement of the 4th Geneva convention in a variety of ways, including regular conferences to review progress. I understand my hon. Friend's frustration and anger, but if we weigh the matter in the balance, we must appreciate how the environment in Israel has changed since the end of September 2000 with the instigation of the so-called armed intifada, which has led to the deaths of about 1,000 Israelis in the most terrifying series of terrorist attacks. In addition to the hundreds of Israeli deaths and injuries, the political process has been paralysed. We want Israel to observe its international and domestic obligations, but we also want a tougher and more effective approach from the Palestinian Authority to clamp down on terrorism emanating from within the occupied territories. We also want a more effective and less ambiguous approach from some of Israel's neighbours, which have encouraged terrorism in the past and still do so today.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): We all agree with what the Foreign Secretary has just said, but because there is such widespread disquiet in the House, particularly among those who would count themselves as friends of Israel, after this Question Time, will he inform the Israeli ambassador that last week's actions are deeply deplored by hon. Members on both sides of the House?

Mr. Straw: I would be delighted to do so. The strength of my representations will be all the greater because it is perfectly plain that that view is reflected in every quarter of the House. The hon. Gentleman will know that I issued a strong statement of condemnation on the morning that the news of Sheikh Yassin's killing came through, and that afternoon my noble Friend Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean called the Israeli ambassador into the Foreign Office to receive our formal complaint.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Foreign Secretary accept that the views expressed up to now this morning do not reflect the views of all hon. Members? Does he understand that Israel's action in killing Sheikh Yassin was a legitimate response to an extraordinary situation? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the hon. Lady speak.

Mrs. Ellman: Sheikh Yassin was the leader of the terrorist organisation, Hamas, which is dedicated to the destruction of the state of Israel, and which greets every attempt to make peace and reconciliation possible with more killings of civilians, whether they be young people in pizzerias and discos or old people at religious ceremonies sitting round the Passover Seder table. Does my right hon. Friend understand that Hamas is the enemy of peace; and can he give us any news as to whether he will follow the lead of the European Union in banning Hamas and its activities in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Straw: Of course I understand the strength of feeling on the part of my hon. Friend and several other hon. Members, but it is fair to say that there is widespread concern about the killing of Sheikh Yassin. I do not believe that any Member of this House who expresses their concern about such killings has, however, any doubts about the nature of Sheikh Yassin. I was the Home Secretary who first banned the military wing of Hamas and took the lead internationally in doing so—certainly in Europe. On Tuesday last week, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the freezing of the assets of several leaders of Hamas. We will continue to take all appropriate action against Hamas and its terrorist activities.

However, I say to my hon. Friend, as I say to my friends in the Israeli Government, that in my judgment, which is widely shared, their actions in adopting this policy of so-called targeted killings—among other things, they are not targeted—is not only unlawful, but counter-productive, because it greatly taxes the support of Israel's friends, as well as its opponents.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): While the loss of innocent Palestinian and Israeli life is equally regrettable, is it not absolutely right that at all material times Hamas must take a large share of responsibility for the loss of lives on both sides owing to its consistent opposition to peace, its use of terrorism to undermine peace, and support for peace, in Israel, and its continuing use of terrorist tactics? Is it not now essential that there should be a change in the Hamas leadership or a move away from support for Hamas on the part of Palestinians so that the emphasis can shift back towards negotiation, and a turning away from the violence to which Hamas is so clearly committed?

Mr. Straw: I entirely agree with the first part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Those who wish peace want to see Hamas not only dealt with appropriately, but marginalised politically. One of the sadnesses of what has happened in the past week is that its result has been far from such political marginalisation.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West) (Lab): The overwhelming majority of Members will support everything that my right hon. Friend has said this morning. As he will know, many countries have had terrorists who went on to become Prime Ministers. We need to reinvigorate the Americans in order that they can get the peace process back on the rails—that is the answer to Hamas and to targeted killings. What is my right hon. Friend doing actively to encourage that?

Mr. Straw: We are doing everything that we can, including providing appropriate security advice to the Palestinian Authority and a great deal of other support. It should be remembered that after the United States, the United Kingdom is the largest bilateral donor to the Palestinian Authority across the international community. That is sometimes forgotten by those who wish to criticise the position of the British Government.

The organisation that has been the greatest block on progress in respect of the road map has been Hamas, because it was behind the bombing on 19 August, which effectively blew up the progress that had been made on the road map, and it has continued its terrorist outrages.

In our own way, we have faced terrorism, albeit on a much, much lower scale than that which is faced by Israel, and we know about some of the moral and political dilemmas that arise from it. We found that the best approach was to be tough but lawful, and to act in a way that ensured that the terrorist organisations were marginalised. That is the view not least of very many people living in Palestine, in the occupied territories, who have nothing but contempt and hatred for Hamas and who wish to see a peaceful outcome to the current terrible conflict.

United Nations Reform

2. Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on United Nations reform. [164121]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): The Government support the United Nations and are fully committed to its reform. We welcome the Secretary-General's decision to set up a high level panel to make recommendations on the way in which the UN can better deal with threats to international peace and security. We are supporting the panel's work and hope that it will make clear recommendations on identifying and tackling the full range of threats to global security.

Mr. Lazarowicz: I welcome the Government's support for the debate on UN reform, especially given the genuine threat of terrorism. Will my hon. Friend ensure that the debate also takes account of the way in which the UN and the wider international community deals with issues such as climate change, world poverty and the sort of continuing dispute, for example, between Israel and the Palestinians, which was the subject of the previous questions? Does he agree that moves to reform the UN would be discredited if they were perceived simply as attempts to change international rules to favour the most powerful nations and allow them to be more successful at getting UN endorsement for their actions than they have sometimes been in the past?

Mr. Rammell: First, I assure my hon. Friend that that is not the intention of the reform debate. We have to demonstrate that the UN has both the physical and political capacity to face up to key strategic challenges such as international terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. However, at the same time, we must tackle global insecurity and inequality. Our arguments are not about justifying the actions of the most powerful; they are emphatically about ensuring that the UN has the capacity to face up to the issues that I outlined. Indeed, the Secretary-General has been arguing for that.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): What is the Government's attitude in principle to the idea of the EU having a seat on the permanent Security Council?

Mr. Rammell: Only sovereign states are eligible to be members of the Security Council. It is therefore inappropriate for the EU to have membership.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that the debate on the UN is profoundly important for this century if we are to have good government and the rule of law throughout the world? In trying to achieve that, we need to give more attention to the needs of failing states, especially the small number that fall under the control of brutal dictators who are so well entrenched that the world has a right to demand their removal. In those circumstances, we should all be in favour of regime change if we have any concern for the stability of the world and the welfare of the populations in those states.

Mr. Rammell: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his arguments on the issue, which we have discussed previously. There is a strong case for earlier intervention in imminent or breaking conflict. We should consider agreeing criteria that justify humanitarian intervention. In this day and age, the argument that as long as nation states maintain their abuse of human rights within state boundaries they should be beyond the reach of the international community is unacceptable.

Sri Lanka

3. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): If he will make a statement on the current situation in Sri Lanka. [164122]

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Mike O'Brien): The general election campaign under way in Sri Lanka has been comparatively peaceful. We welcome that, especially since the elections on 2 April will come at an important time in the peace process. After the elections, we will look to the new Government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam—LTTE—to resume peace negotiations as soon as possible.

Mr. Carmichael: But does the Minister share my concern about the continuing and increasing persecution of religious minorities, including Christians, in Sri Lanka? Will he give some assurance that, following Friday's election, the most robust representations possible will be made to the effect that the proposed anti-conversion Bill is an unacceptable breach of religious freedoms and would place Sri Lanka outwith the family of civilised nations?

Mr. O'Brien: No individual should be persecuted for their faith. I understand that discussions have taken place in the Sri Lankan Government about some form of anti-conversion legislation. However, no decision has been made on the form that it is likely to take. Parliament in Sri Lanka was dissolved in February and the matter fell for the time being. Our high commissioner has raised the issue with Ministers in Sri Lanka and they said that any law would be carefully discussed with representatives of all major religions in the country to ensure that no religion was discriminated against. They also said that any measure would be targeted against what they call unethical conversions, which means those obtained by financial or other inducements. However, we look to the new Sri Lankan Government to continue to uphold the freedom to have or to adopt a religion of one's choice, which is currently enshrined in the Sri Lankan constitution.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Among those contesting Friday's elections are an array of Sinhalese nationalists who reject all forms of co-operation with the Tamils and try to deny minority representation. Does the Minister believe that all the excellent work done by the United Nations in the two years since the ceasefire is imperilled by Friday's possible outcomes? Should not greater efforts be made to bring Tamils back into national life and national development?

Mr. O'Brien: Of course, substantial efforts are being made to bring the Tamils back into Sri Lankan life. The negotiations that have been conducted to bring forward the peace process have in many ways, at least until recently, been a model and a bright light in what otherwise has been a difficult international landscape. As my hon. Friend refers to the considerable work being done by the UN, may I add that enormously important work has been done by the Norwegians in getting this process going and succeeding? They have done a tremendous job. We will have to await the outcome of elections, but either way the peace process is likely to continue, certainly with the support of the UN and this Government.

Former Yugoslavia

4. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): If he will make a statement on recent ethnic conflict in former Yugoslavia. [164123]

7. Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the Governments of (a) Hungary, Poland, the Czech Republic and Slovakia and (b) Russia about the future political status of Kosovo. [164126]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): The events in Kosovo were a tragic outburst of inter-ethnic violence, with 22 people killed and nearly 900 injured. The response of NATO and the European Union helped to stabilise the situation, and it was discussed at the EU General Affairs and External Relations Council last week. There are regular discussions with members of the contact group, including Russia, and with all European partners, including the new EU member states, on the future of Kosovo.

Mr. Andrew Turner: I thank the Minister for his reply. Does he agree that a particularly vicious manifestation of this conflict is the destruction of irreplaceable cultural heritage? Recently, 42 monasteries and Serbian Orthodox churches have been destroyed in Kosovo. What steps can be taken to protect such buildings, which are part of the heritage of us all?

Mr. MacShane: I share completely the hon. Gentleman's protest about the loss of European cultural heritage. I visited the great monastery of Gracanica, and I know that our soldiers, as well as those from other NATO forces, have been deployed to guard churches. Equally, the burning down of the mosque in Belgrade was an unacceptable assault on the Muslim religion in the Balkans. I will visit Kosovo shortly, and I will make the point that that part of Europe's history deserves our special attention and protection.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. I have just returned from Budapest as a member of a delegation of MPs and peers who discussed this issue with Hungarian MPs and Ministers. We were left in no doubt of their concern, and that of other Visegrad countries that have troops in the region, about the escalation of the problem. Does he accept that the concerns expressed by Javier Solana at the EU summit about the political situation in Kosovo—I understand that the Russians will raise the issue at the NATO Council in three or four days' time—underline the need for us to be more proactive in seeking a political settlement in Kosovo?

Mr. MacShane: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is a common view across Europe that for the last three or four years we have been chained to the wheels of events rather than guiding Kosovo and Serbia to a new political relationship and future. That relationship must be formed on the basis of common European values, maintain standards relating to the rule of law and democracy, and above all, show respect for minorities, other religions and the culture and communities of people who have lived there for many hundreds of years. The issue of Kosovo and the future of Kosovo and Serbia now require serious political thought and consideration.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): Echoing that point, and given the recent announcement that the spearhead battalion is going into Kosovo with all the personal danger involved, may I ask what moves the Government are making at a political level to minimise the risks to our personnel that arise from the current political vacuum?

Mr. MacShane: I have visited British troops on the ground in Kosovo, and believe me, they are not just doing the superb professional job that we all know they do, but winning hearts and minds and working with both communities. To be honest, I am delighted that British troops have been found to go there because I think they will add value in helping to stabilise the local situation, but ultimately a political solution must be found. Much more serious consideration must be given to that.

Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West) (Lab): I join my hon. Friend in praising the actions and standards of British troops in Kosovo. I went there recently with the Defence Select Committee. Does my hon. Friend agree, however, that the rule of law has not yet been established, as Kosovo is effectively still being run by Albanian-led criminal gangs? As Bosnia demonstrated, the rule of law must be established before both democracy and investment can be promoted. Will my hon. Friend stress to our allies who still have national caveats preventing the closest and most effective working relationships between the civilian police and the military that priority must be given to removing those caveats?

Mr. MacShane: My hon. Friend makes fair points, although I think that President Rugova and Prime Minister Rexhepi are decent and honourable men, and I would not want to refer to links between them and criminal gangs. It is all too easy to fling insults around. It must also be said that the closest possible support for the rule of law is needed throughout the region, including full-hearted co-operation with the international criminal tribunal in The Hague. If everyone in the Balkans made sure that those accused of serious war crimes, for example, were taken to The Hague, that would send a positive signal.

My hon. Friend is right to say that we need state authority in Kosovo. We need authority over property and investments, over the rule of law and over the bringing of people to justice. Some 189 people have been detained in connection with the recent inter-ethnic violence, and I hope that if a charge is approved they will speedily be brought before courts.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): Does the Minister recall that throughout the 1990s Europe was grossly disfigured by ethnic conflict in the former Yugoslavia, and does he recall the initial collective failure to deal with that properly? Examples such as Srebrenica, where 7,000 men and boys were slaughtered, are a shaming memorial to that failure. Those events make the need to restore stability in Kosovo all the more urgent.

The Minister has heard the House's general view that political initiatives are required. Will he take this opportunity to state Her Majesty's Government's position on a political initiative that is sometimes promoted, namely independence for Kosovo?

Mr. MacShane: The status of Kosovo is on the agenda, but I think it important for us to maintain our position, which is that we want the application of what I described as European standards in Kosovo. Violence must not be rewarded in any way: we must attach ourselves to that important principle. I also think that we need a new dialogue between Pristina and Belgrade. Some initial remarks in Belgrade were not helpful, although since then a commitment by the Belgrade city government and the Pristina authorities to rebuild mosques and churches has gone in the right direction.

As the right hon. and learned Gentleman says, we need a political solution to the problem of Kosovo. The international community must pay much more attention to that.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South) (Lab): In view of the need to maintain the rule of law in Kosovo, is there any evidence in the recent past that KFOR has perhaps relaxed its vigilance there?

Mr. MacShane: I do not think so. KFOR is a military operation. I have visited the area, as have many hon. Members, to see KFOR operations on the ground. It is a professional organisation and the outburst of violence happened fast and spread like bushfire. We have sent troops to help stabilise the situation. Once again, we could put even more troops in Kosovo, but what is really required is a political solution that must involve Belgrade and other partners in the region. I say again that it is not my intention to go through all the different options from the Dispatch Box, but the Government are now addressing themselves seriously, in collaboration with our partners, to tackling the problems.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Deeply regrettable though it is, is it not a fact of recent history in the Balkans that peace has rarely been achieved until the different ethnic groups of the population are separated, as in Bosnia? Do the British Government support an eventual solution for Kosovo that is based on those means?

Mr. MacShane: Having witnessed ethnic cleansing carried out by terrorist and militia activity, I do not believe that that is a policy that the House should easily sanction now where peace prevails. The hon. Gentleman might care to visit Croatia, where he would find that some Serbs had returned, or other parts of the Balkans where different communities live in peace—just south of Kosovo in Macedonia, for example. The notion that Europe can grow and develop only on the basis of driving different communities out of where they have lived over many years does not sit well with common European values.

Israel

5. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the US Administration about the Israeli wall. [164124]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): We are in regular contact with the US Administration, at all levels, about the situation in the middle east, including the Israeli fence and wall.

Mr. Hall: Does my right hon. Friend share my view that the Israeli wall—particularly the part built illegally within Palestinian territory—generates a deep sense of injustice and anger among the people whose lives are disrupted by it every day? Does he agree that such injustice acts as a recruiting sergeant for extremists such as Hamas? They and the Israeli extremists deliberately maintain the vicious cycle of violence, which is unlikely to be broken unless and until the US adopts the unambiguous position that the wall must be removed. What more can the British Government do to impress that policy on the US Administration?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the adverse effects of the wall. When completed, about 210,000 acres or 14.5 per cent. of west bank land, excluding East Jerusalem, will lie between the barrier and the green line. That land is among the most fertile in the west bank and is home to 275,000 people, so the wall is already of great and adverse consequence to the people who are trapped between it, the barrier and the green line. Once the wall is completed, it will be of even greater consequence.

We have many conversations with the US Administration in respect of the middle east, as well as other foreign policy issues. The US is the most influential power on the Government of Israel, but I have to say to my hon. Friend that the Government of Israel are nonetheless a sovereign Government and many people in the US Administration will say that it is not they in Washington who take decisions for the Government of Israel, but the Government of Israel in Jerusalem. That is true.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): Is it not sadly unrealistic for us to expect any bold new initiative from the Americans on getting the two sides back together in the run-up to the presidential election? Is there not therefore a dangerous vacuum in the middle east peace process, which Britain should be seeking to fill? Can the Foreign Secretary tell us exactly what the British Government are doing to try to get the two sides back around the table together? Is there not now a strong case for shuttle diplomacy on the part of the British Foreign Secretary to try to put the road map back on track?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that suggestion. If I felt that all that lay between the current terrible conflict and a peace settlement was my shuttling back and forth between Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Ramallah, I would be there and would stay there until a settlement was achieved. Sadly, I do not take that view, and it is unrealistic to believe that any outside interlocutor—be it the British Foreign Secretary, the American Secretary of State or heads of state and government—can achieve that because the divide is so great and the hatred and fears on both sides so profound.

The United States Government remain engaged and committed, notwithstanding the fact that an election is coming up. We are working with the Palestinians above all and especially on their own security, because unless and until the Palestinian Authority can demonstrate that they can take control of security in their own territory in Gaza and the west bank, they will be unable to convince Israel or the international community that they can be an effective interlocutor. That is what we are doing, and we are making considerable progress. We continue to provide substantial aid to the Palestinian Authority and the Palestinian people, and we are working through the European Union and the Quartet, and with the Government of Israel.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a number of us who happen to be of Jewish origin by birth totally condemn Israeli policy in the occupied territories, consider that there is no justification for what is happening, and equally condemn murderous suicide bombings, which, as he says, are counter-productive? Is it not true that the only country that can make any impression on Israel and put any pressure on it is the United States? And has not the United States a duty and a responsibility to act in accordance with the wishes of the international community and to pressure Israel into observing international law?

Mr. Straw: As I have said, the United States has the greatest external influence, but it is only an external influence; decisions are for the sovereign Government of Israel, who jealously guard their own power and autonomy. We need to acknowledge the significant progress that the Bush Administration have made in the past three years in respect of Israel and Palestine. It was President Bush who pushed for the adoption of what became resolution 1393, which for the first time recognised a two-state solution: a secure state of Israel, side by side with a viable state of Palestine. That has been supplemented by resolutions confirming the road map, in which the United States played a leading part, along with the European Union and ourselves. The United States is engaged, but external actors can be as engaged as they like: that will have no effect unless and until the parties directly involved in the conflict are willing to negotiate.

Zimbabwe

6. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What action is being taken by the Government to assist in the restoration of freedom and democracy in Zimbabwe. [164125]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): The Government are providing practical and political support to civil society, human rights organisations and all those in Zimbabwe who want an early return to democratically accountable government that respects human rights and the rule of law. We have played a leading part in the European Union's decision to extend its sanctions against leading members of the regime.

Simon Hughes: Yesterday in this House, the Prime Minister made it clear that he raised the issue of Zimbabwe with Colonel Gaddafi last week, and he also made clear the British Government's opposition to what the Libyan Government have been saying. What proactive initiatives will Her Majesty's Government take to make sure that the Libyan Government in particular, and other African Governments more generally, change their view and withdraw the help, encouragement and support that they have been giving Mr. Mugabe?

Mr. Mullin: A lot of African Governments take the same view that we do of what goes on in Zimbabwe, but we maintain constant dialogue with them—no doubt we will do so with Libya—in order to make our view clear. Many are under the illusion that it has something to do with our failure to support land reform. Mr. Mugabe has spread that falsehood rather effectively, but we rebut it at every opportunity. We are ready to support land reform, provided that it is carried out in an honest and democratic fashion, rather than by Mugabe's thugs.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that I have raised with him the question of political activists in the Zimbabwean Opposition whose lives are in danger. In view of the fact that a political activist was killed this week, will he consider giving more sympathy to activists who want temporary refuge in Britain until such time as Mugabe is finished?

Mr. Mullin: That is not within my gift. There are many Zimbabwean refugees in this country, and we consider carefully their applications for asylum. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the recent murder of a political activist in the course of a by-election in Harare. He may have seen the report "Playing with Fire", which was published recently by a South African non-governmental organisation. It says that 24 per cent. of Opposition Members of Parliament in Zimbabwe have been the subject of assassination attempts—a truly astonishing figure—and 16 per cent. have been tortured and three murdered. That in a nutshell tells us all we need to know about life in Zimbabwe under Mr. Mugabe's regime.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): May I gently ask the Minister when he will do more than just wring his hands about Zimbabwe? When will the Government take action? When will they start freezing the assets of the wealthy businessmen, some of them in this country, who bankroll Mugabe? When will he extend and tighten the European Union's targeted sanctions to bring real and effective pressure on Mugabe and his henchmen? When will the Government formally ask the United Nations to deploy staff to monitor the distribution of food in Zimbabwe? Those are three practical suggestions. When will the Government show some moral courage and stop walking by on the other side?

Mr. Mullin: We are not wringing hands. Indeed, some Conservative Members shook hands with Mr. Mugabe in the not-too-distant past. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows very well that we played a leading part in extending the European sanctions. No day passes without the issue of Zimbabwe crossing my desk in some form or another. We take it very seriously indeed. We have been extremely proactive, and the Zimbabweans are well aware of that. So is the Movement for Democratic Change, which regularly thanks us for the assistance that we give and our attempts to draw attention to what is going on in Zimbabwe. I utterly reject the nonsense that comes from those on the Conservative Benches.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What message does my hon. Friend have for the England cricket team, which is due to tour Zimbabwe later this year? The team does not want to go, but under international cricket rules it can withdraw only if the Government instruct it not to go. I understand my hon. Friend's unwillingness to instruct an independent sporting body, but what can be done to break the impasse? Surely the will of the British people should prevail. I am sure that it is their will that the team should not tour Zimbabwe.

Mr. Mullin: We have made it clear from the outset that we disapprove of the proposed tour of Zimbabwe, but we do not have the power to instruct the team not to go.

EU Constitution

8. Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): If he will make a statement on negotiations concerning the proposed EU Constitution. [164127]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House yesterday, the European Council last week requested the Irish presidency to continue its consultations and as soon as appropriate to arrange for the resumption of formal negotiations in the IGC.

Mr. Shepherd: I am obliged for that answer, but does the Foreign Secretary agree that under the proposed constitution the European Court of Justice has the power to strike down an Act of Parliament in conflict with European law or the European constitution?

Mr. Straw: That power has existed within the treaties since we joined the European Union in 1972, and it is reflected in the treaties that gave primacy to European law over United Kingdom domestic law. It is reflected in existing decisions of the European Court of Justice, and it is reflected in section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972, which was pushed through the House by the Conservative party. Article 10 of the draft constitution, which deals with the primacy of European law, has been confirmed and will be confirmed in a declaration as doing no more than restating the existing state of the law.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary agree that this is an important subject about which we should have a big conversation with the British people? How better could that big conversation be terminated than by a referendum?

Mr. Straw: I agree—[HON. MEMBERS: "Stop there!"] If I am allowed to conclude my sentence, I shall say what I agree with. I agree not only that we should have a big conversation about the issue, but that we have been doing so. I have ensured that it has been the subject of a far greater degree of parliamentary scrutiny—by this House, its Committees and the other place—than has ever happened before on any draft constitutional treaty emanating from the European Union, and long may that continue. It is for each individual Member to have a big conversation with his or her electorate. For my own part, I never stop having big conversations with the people of Blackburn, including in Blackburn town centre, where I can often be found at 10.30 on a Saturday morning talking directly to my electorate. I recommend that to all Members.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that the UK Government is content to allow the common fisheries policy to be enshrined as an exclusive competence within the new constitution? Will he confirm that fishing is not a red line issue for the British Government and that they do not think that it is important enough to put to a referendum for the people of Scotland to decide on?

Mr. Straw: We have discussed this before. I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, but he is wrong. There is no change in the competences in respect of fishing. Under article I-12 on exclusive competence, there will be—as there is today—exclusive competence in respect of the conservation of marine biological resources under the common fisheries policy. However, in respect of article I-13, every other aspect of fishing remains a shared competence.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Given that the European Union will be enlarged on 1 May, does my right hon. Friend agree that if agreement were reached on the constitutional treaty, it would help to make the Union function far more effectively?

Mr. Straw: I agree with my hon. Friend in every particular. The case for the constitutional treaty is that it will help make the Union more effective. It will not transfer powers, in any substantive degree, to the European Union. Indeed, the reverse point was made when the House of Lords European Union Committee examined the matter. The Committee spelled it out in detail:

> "It is clear that the balance of power in the European Union is going to shift, but from the Commission in favour of the member states if the proposals in the Convention are adopted."

That is true.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): When will the Government come clean about the constitution? When will they decide whether it is essential if enlargement is to work, as we were told yesterday, or not necessary for that purpose, which is what we were told in December? Will the Foreign Secretary take the opportunity to disown the absurd suggestion that came out of Brussels last week that the constitution was somehow central to the fight against terrorism? The Prime Minister was quoted on Friday as saying that he wanted to dispel what he called "the myths" about the constitution. Why not start with the Government's myth, which is not believed by anyone else in Europe, that the constitution is not integrationist and admit, as the Belgian Prime Minister has done, that it is > "the capstone for a federal Europe"?

Mr. Straw: I advise the right hon. and learned Gentleman not to pray the Prime Minister of Belgium too often in support, because that could lead him down some dangerous rabbit holes. We have never suggested that the constitution is essential to enlargement. It is a self-evident truth that enlargement will take place on 1 May before any draft treaty could conceivably be put in place. What we have said is that it is highly desirable to make the enlarged Union work effectively, which is the case that we have put forward.

I am aware of all the right hon. and learned Gentleman's bluster on the draft constitution, but he has never given us clear further and better particulars of how he believes that the draft constitution—amended, as it will have to be if we are to recommend it to the House—could conceivably lead to the creation of some kind of super-federal state, because the simple truth is that it will not.

Mr. Ancram: For the record, at column 1263 in Hansard yesterday the Prime Minister actually said that the constitution was essential to make enlargement work. That is what I said, and the Foreign Secretary has denied it. He had better make up his mind because he and the Prime Minister seem to be at odds.

What is so different about this country that the British people, unlike the Irish, the Portuguese, the Danes, the Dutch or the Poles and many others, are not to be trusted with taking a sensible decision in a referendum? On Friday, the Prime Minister said that he wanted a real debate on the constitution, yet it appears that he intends a guillotine process, excluding the British people, designed solely to get this thorny issue out of the way before a general election. Will the Foreign Secretary deny reports that the Government intend to steamroller ratification of the treaty through Parliament in the current Session? Does he not realise how unacceptable that contempt for democracy would be to the British people?

Mr. Straw: I am very happy to deny those reports because they are not true; there is no constitutional treaty before the House. Any draft treaty would be examined with the greatest of care by the House and the other place in accordance with the constitutional arrangements that the Conservatives put in place—

Mr. Ancram: This Session?

Mr. Straw: I cannot say whether it will be in this or the next Session; it very much depends on when and whether—if and whether—a draft constitutional treaty is agreed politically. We should then have to wait for the final text to be cleared by the linguist jurists in Brussels before bringing it to the House. We shall examine it, and the House will be invited to examine it, in accordance with procedures laid down by the Conservatives when they were in government.

I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the two biggest sets of changes in the way that the European Union operates and in its powers—particularly qualified majority voting—are to be found in the Single European Act 1986 and the Maastricht treaty of 1992. There was no referendum on the Single European Act. There was a proposal for a referendum on the Maastricht treaty—but what did the right hon. and learned Gentleman do? He spoke against the proposal for a referendum on the Maastricht treaty and he marched into the Lobby against the referendum on the Maastricht treaty even though the Maastricht treaty vastly extended powers to a degree that this draft will not do. We will take no lectures on the issue of a referendum—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Chris Bryant.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Notwithstanding the circumstances, does the Foreign Secretary welcome the election of the Spanish Socialist Workers party, which unblocked the logjam in the process for bringing about a constitutional treaty? Obviously, if a constitutional treaty is brought forward, national Parliaments in Europe will have a much greater role in scrutinising EU legislation, so does he agree that the House will have to improve its act to do that effectively?

Mr. Straw: Of course we welcome the election of a sister party into government in Spain. That has already been made clear.

There is indeed a strong requirement for far better scrutiny of proposals emanating from the European Union, and it is for that reason that I made a statement to the House about four weeks ago, with all sorts of proposals about how scrutiny by the House, the other place and our Committees could be strengthened.

India/Pakistan

9. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If he will make a statement on his assessment of relations between India and Pakistan. [164128]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall answer Questions 9 and 10 together. We warmly welcome the recent talks between India and Pakistan—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Question 10 is about Cyprus.

Mr. Straw: I apologise, Mr. Speaker. Question 10 was listed yesterday.

We warmly welcome the recent talks between India and Pakistan and the significant improvement in their relationship. During my recent visits to India and Pakistan, I congratulated President Musharraf, Deputy Prime Minister Advani and Foreign Ministers Kasuri and Sinha on that. We recognise that the talks, due to begin after the Indian general election, may be a long and difficult process, but I very much hope that they will, in due course, lead to a durable settlement of all the outstanding issues, including Kashmir. On 27 January, I wrote to all colleagues in the House spelling out in more detail the progress that had been made in respect of Kashmir.

Mr. Luff: In answer to an earlier question, we heard about the importance that cricket can play in international relations, so will the Foreign Secretary join me in expressing pleasure that the courage shown by the leaders of India and Pakistan has been mirrored so dramatically by the behaviour of the cricket fans of both countries during a thrilling one-day series and, again, during the ongoing test series? Given that those two countries were on the brink of nuclear war, some said, only two years ago, given that the process of dialogue is now so firmly entrenched and given the unique relationship that we enjoy with both those countries, what more does the Foreign Secretary think that we can do to build on that uniquely optimistic scenario?

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman is entirely right to draw attention to the importance of confidence-building measures, including cricket. The fact that the tests have gone as well as they have, without any violence, has greatly strengthened each side's confidence in the other, after years of enmity. The best that we can do is to support both sides in the process. Of course there are international dimensions to the process, which were terrifying two years ago, but it is essentially a bilateral conflict, so our role is one of support, not interference.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): As a Member of Parliament who represents people of Indian and Pakistani heritage, as well as a fairly substantial Kashmiri community, may I say how much I welcome improved relations between India and Pakistan, but does my right hon. Friend agree that, if we can bring India and Pakistan around the table to discuss the thorny issue of Kashmir, all shades of Kashmiri opinion should be taken into account, and that we should eventually involve Kashmiris themselves in any final solution?

Mr. Straw: The Governments of both India and Pakistan recognise that Kashmir can have a stable future only if that future and its arrangements involve the communities on both sides of the line of control.

Cyprus

10. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): What travel advice he was issuing to visitors to Cyprus on 20 March 2003. [164130]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the answer that I gave on 25 February 2004 to his written question on this issue.

Mr. Gray: For the benefit of the House, I shall remind it what the Minister's response was. On 20 March 2003, as our troops were storming into Iraq, the Foreign Office website was advising:

"Cyprus is not directly affected by the situation in Iraq. We therefore see no reason for holiday plans to be changed."

How does he square that with the dossier, which, at precisely the same moment, was advising:

"Iraq has . . . 20 missiles with a range of 650 km, capable of carrying chemical and biological warheads, making Cyprus . . . vulnerable."

Which was right—the Foreign Office website or the dossier—and which turned out to be right in the end?

Mr. MacShane: The hon. Gentleman is revisiting an old and familiar theme. He has elided two dates: those of the September dossier, which referred to the capabilities that our intelligence agencies considered Saddam to have—an assessment shared by all other Governments at the time—and of travel advice, given six months later, that said that we did not believe that Cyprus faced a threat. The plain fact is that, for the tourism industry in Cyprus, the Government of Cyprus and the many British citizens who have relations with Cyprus, it was important to give accurate and fair travel advice. Of course it turned out to be true: Cyprus was not affected by the conflict. If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that the dossier should not have referred to Saddam's capabilities, he will join a very motley and unfortunate crew indeed.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (Knowsley, South) (Lab): As he looks forward positively and not backward negatively about Cyprus, my hon. Friend will be aware that negotiations for a solution to the Cyprus problem are in their final, delicate stages, and we hope that the outcome will be that a united Cyprus will enter the European Union on 1 May. The negotiations may well be subject to some final adjustment by the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Will my hon. Friend give his assurance that Her Majesty's Government will do all they can to ensure that any final outcome of the negotiations will not include any permanent derogations from the EU's founding principles, such as one with respect to the settlement of Greeks in northern Cyprus and the permanent placement of foreign troops on the island?

Mr. MacShane: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue. He is right. Today in Bürgenstock in Switzerland, the closing stages of negotiations are taking place and the authority is now with the Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, because Greek and Turkish Cypriots could not come to an agreement. We must wish him well.

I accept the point about European norms, but there are exceptions in many countries to EU acquis and rules. It is important to ensure that EU unilateralism—if I may put it that way—is not seen as superior to the decisions taken by Kofi Annan. The House has an enormous role to play once a decision leaves Bürgenstock. We should use all our influence and power with all our friends in Cyprus on both sides of the green line to urge them to say yes to this and to allow a united Cyprus to enter the EU and start a new and peaceful era in its history.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday I raised with Madam Deputy Speaker the anxieties of my constituents near Heathrow, bearing in mind that the last time there was a crash at Heathrow, the plane landed in my constituency. Those concerns arose from articles in Sunday newspapers. As I suspect you are aware, Mr. Speaker, there have been anti-terrorist actions around Heathrow this morning, which raise further concerns among my constituents. The Metropolitan police are putting a significant amount of information into the public domain, so would you use your good offices to have a word with the Home Secretary so that he will tell the House as much as he can about what has been going on this morning? My constituents and others are deeply worried because they feel at risk.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns. No doubt, the record will be read and the appropriate Minister will take heed of the hon. Gentleman's concerns.

Corporate Killing

12.32 pm

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to create a new offence of corporate killing that applies to all companies and unincorporated bodies.

Over the years, the issue of corporate killing—or corporate manslaughter—has been raised many times in the House. The last attempt to introduce legislation on it was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) in April 2000, and I am pleased to see him in his place. The issue raises strong feelings and it is worth reflecting a little on why so many people, particularly Labour Members, see it as so important.

In the late 1980s in the United Kingdom, there was a series of disasters, each of which shocked the nation. Even today the roll-call is painful to recite. In March 1987, the Herald of Free Enterprise ran aground off Zeebrugge, with 192 dead; in 1987, the King's Cross underground fire left 31 dead; in July 1988, the Piper Alpha oil platform disaster left 167 dead; in 1988, the Clapham rail crash left 37 dead; in 1989 the Kegworth airline crash left 47 dead; in 1989; the Hillsborough football stadium disaster left 97 dead; and in 1989, the Marchioness river boat sinking left 51 dead.

Those disasters involved different companies and occurred across a diverse range of industries, but the public inquiry that followed each one had a common thread: the disaster could have been prevented had the company involved taken steps to ensure that its organisation operated safe systems of work within a strong safety culture.

The disaster with which I am most familiar is Piper Alpha. I will not rehearse all the background to it; suffice it to say that Lord Cullen, who carried out the public inquiry, made fierce criticisms of Occidental, the oil company operating the Piper Alpha oil platform. He said that there were "significant flaws in the quality of"

Occidental Petroleum's

"management of safety which affected the circumstances of the events of the disaster . . . Occidental management should have been more aware of the need for a high standard in incident provision and firefighting."

He went on to say:

"Senior management were too easily satisfied that the permit to work system was being operated correctly, relying on the absence of any feedback of problems as indicating that all was well . . . they adopted a superficial attitude to the assessment of the risk of major hazard."

I shall come back to Piper Alpha later.

The accumulation of disasters—and inquiry conclusions that suggested, at best, that there was a widespread problem of a poor safety culture—led to demands for improvement. There was also increasing concern about the inability of the law to punish those responsible for the perceived negligence that led to many unnecessary deaths. There is a common law offence of corporate manslaughter or culpable homicide in Scotland. In England, the offence may be committed by companies or individuals. An individual commits manslaughter if it can be proved beyond reasonable doubt that he or she caused a death through gross or wilful negligence. There is no separate test that allows the court to consider whether the company acted with gross negligence. For example, it is not possible for the courts to consider a company's various failures and determine whether, on aggregate, it could be said that they constituted gross negligence. Corporate guilt is entirely dependent on individual guilt.

In practice, the offence is extremely difficult to prove. The Piper Alpha case was considered under Scots law, under which the tests are similar. The Lord Advocate refused to instruct a prosecution. He decided that there was insufficient evidence on which to base a successful prosecution, despite all the harsh words of, and the evidence placed before, Lord Cullen. Indeed, after most of the disasters in the 1980s on which an inquiry was held, there was no—or inadequate—investigation of criminal offences.

In 1996, the Law Commission for England and Wales produced a report on involuntary manslaughter that recommended two offences of unintentional killing which were based on different fault elements: reckless killing and killing by gross carelessness. The commission prepared a draft Bill. The Labour party manifesto in 1997 gave a commitment to introduce legislation, and that was reinforced after the election by the then Home Secretary. Since then, there has been a consultation process and several statements confirming that commitment, including a further manifesto commitment in 2001.

During consideration on Report of the Criminal Justice Bill in 2003, the Home Secretary said that the Government would announce a timetable for legislation and that they intended to publish a draft Bill. That timetable has not yet been provided, and there is no sign of the draft Bill. Indeed, the rumblings from inside Whitehall are not positive. It is suggested that there are still serious difficulties with the Bill and there is speculation that the main problems centre on the issue of Crown immunity. Of course, I have no way of knowing whether that is true or simply gossip, but if there is a problem, the Government need to resolve it quickly.

My Bill would provide that a corporation would be guilty of corporate killing if a management failure by that corporation was the cause, or one of the causes, of a person's death, and if that failure constituted conduct that fell far below what could reasonably be expected of the corporation in the circumstances. The Bill would also apply to a Crown body. It should apply to the Crown and it would considerably strengthen the health and safety culture in this country.

Lord Cullen's inquiry into the Piper Alpha disaster made it clear that there were substantial and significant failings in the way in which the Department of Energy too, which was then responsible for enforcing safety offshore, carried out its responsibilities. A short time before the disaster, a worker was killed on the Piper Alpha platform. Department of Energy inspectors investigated and made recommendations, but none of them was carried out, which meant that the last hope of preventing the Piper Alpha tragedy was lost.

I have always been concerned that there was no prosecution of Occidental, the oil company that operated the Piper Alpha platform. If my Bill had been in force at that time, there would have been a prosecution. There is no question in my mind but that if Occidental had been prosecuted, it would have been appropriate to prosecute the Department of Energy. We cannot have a system that punishes operators for poor safety if we do not apply the same standards to those who are required to regulate the safety system. If the Government are still wrestling with how Crown immunity might apply in the case of corporate killing, I urge Home Office Ministers to contact their colleagues in the Department for Work and Pensions.

In June 2000, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions published "Revitalising Health and Safety", which was described as a strategy statement, and which included a number of action points. Action point 15 states:

"the Government will seek a legislative opportunity, when parliamentary time allows, to remove crown immunity from statutory health and safety enforcement."

As the House knows, responsibility for health and safety now lies with the Department for Work and Pensions.

My Bill would extend to Scotland, which I think is important. Although responsibility for legislation lies with the Home Office, the Bill is a health and safety measure that will apply in the main to companies and businesses throughout the UK. Both health and safety law and corporate law apply across the UK, and uniformity is vital, especially within larger corporations.

The main purpose of my Bill is not to create queues of recalcitrant company directors, or even civil servants, being brought before the courts to be punished for their poor safety records. Its purpose is to act as a disincentive to poor safety systems and to encourage companies and others to recognise that poor safety is far more expensive, in every way, than good and strong safety cultures and practices. My earnest wish is that the Government introduce their legislation as soon as possible, but in the meantime, I recommend the Corporate Killing Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Frank Doran, Tony Lloyd, Judy Mallaber, Ian Stewart, Geraldine Smith, Mr. Andrew Dismore, Miss Anne Begg, Rob Marris, Joan Ruddock, and Mr. Bill Olner.

Corporate Killing

Mr. Frank Doran accordingly presented a Bill to create a new offence of corporate killing that applies to all companies and unincorporated bodies: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 21 May, and to be printed [Bill 84].

Opposition Day

[8TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Immigration Entry Clearance Standards

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

12.42 pm

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the Government's failure to maintain immigration entry clearance standards; regrets the confusion as to whom the relaxed guidance actually applies; notes the unwillingness of Ministers to take responsibility for the operation of immigration policies; expresses deep concern that, at a time when homeland security is paramount, current fast-tracking procedures do not enable full and thorough checks on applicants; applauds those public servants who bring the Home Office's failings and dishonest internal workings to the attention of honourable Members and the wider public; calls on Her Majesty' Government to reinstate those officials currently suspended from duty; recognises with regret that recent revelations have exposed grave deficiencies in the immigration service; and believes that the Government has lost both the confidence and the trust of the British people in its ability to control immigration policy.

Before I start on the substantive motion, may I, through the Home Secretary, offer the congratulations of the Opposition—and, I suspect, all hon. Members—to the security services and the police on the remarkable operation that they carried out today, thwarting, we believe, a major terrorist attack?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his words. I believe that we all give considerable thanks to the security services and the counter-terrorism branch, which have done and are doing a first-class job of securing our safety. We now wish to ensure that due process of law takes its course and that the public, especially in those local communities, are reassured both of the adequacy of policing, and that we have in hand any other measures that might be necessary to secure social cohesion.

David Davis: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that.

Today's debate is about the effective collapse of immigration controls in this country. Let us start by recognising the origins of that catastrophic failure. In May 1997, the Labour Government tore up all our policies on immigration and asylum. In particular, they got rid of the so-called white list, restraints on benefits and the agreement with the French Government. The result was an increase of 200,000 incomers per annum in the UK in the first five years of the Labour Government. It is therefore no wonder that the immigration and nationality directorate was collapsing under the strain.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I will give way in a minute.

That is why the Government have a problem. It is why they are mounting a pathetic attempt to blame everyone else—the civil service, the right-wing press including the Daily Mirror, and now the Conservatives. That is daft. We did not face half a million incomers every year, because we got our strategy right.

What emerges from the documents—[Interruption.] I am sure that hon. Members will be on their feet today. What emerges from the documents that we have seen so far—and the new documents that I am releasing today—is a picture of civil servants—honourable, committed and hardworking—who are struggling under impossible burdens.

David Davis: I will give way in a moment. I see that we have a good set of Government Whips' plants today—almost vegetables, one might say.

These are civil servants who were instructed to hit clearance targets with no consideration for the quality or purpose of the work that they do. Civil servants are being instructed to do—

David Taylor: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I will give way in a moment.

Civil servants are being instructed to do things that they believe are improper or even illegal. We are clear from what they say, explicitly, that the collapse has happened over the past two or three years, not 10 or 20 years. It emerges also that these civil servants are the heroes of the piece, not the villains, as Ministers have intimated during the past few weeks.

I give way to the first plant.

David Taylor: I will resist the temptation to turn this intervention into a point of order that ends in my instructing my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) for being called a Government Whips' plant.

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether that golden asylum and immigration legacy to which he is referring, which the Government inherited on 1 May 1997, included an average time to deal with applications of almost two years? Does he not believe that that played some part in the problems that have been encountered since then?

David Davis: I shall remind the hon. Gentleman of the figures, if he wants to talk numbers. I always enjoy bandying numbers with Whips' plants. In our last year in office, I think that there were 35,000 applicants, compared with 125,000 in Labour's first year in office.

I shall move on to the sequence of events.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I will give way in a moment—I will give another plant a chance.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Speaking as a Whip non-plant, perhaps I could strengthen the evidence that my right hon. Friend is giving the House by telling him that over the past two to three years the Breckland district council, which covers part of my constituency, has calculated that between 15,000 and 20,000 migrant workers have arrived in its district area. It has no means of knowing whether they are here legally or illegally. It has been extremely difficult to raise concerns among Ministers about whether these people are protected, catered for, dealt with or in any way rendered less vulnerable than invisible people will be.

David Davis: My right hon. Friend makes an excellent point. She flags up something that I had not intended to raise, but I think it important: that is, that the issue has serious implications. The proper management of immigration in its totality has an important role in improving or maintaining good community relations, reducing or controlling the burdens on societies and protecting the people themselves. As the cockle pickers' incident demonstrated only too clearly—it took the Government six weeks to convene a ministerial meeting—everyone is affected, including people coming into the country.

I shall go through the events of the past few weeks. Three weeks ago, the civil servant, Steve Moxon, revealed that immigration officials in Sheffield had been ordered by senior managers to drop key checks on migrants coming to Britain under the European Community Association Agreement. First, the Home Office denied it categorically again and again. Eventually, the Minister was forced to admit that the allegations were correct. However, she did not tell us the full facts.

The Immigration Minister told the House that the decision to waive checks was "rare and untypical". Now we have learned that it applied to bogus students, sham marriages, people with dubious immigration histories—in fact, it applied to anyone whose application was more than three months old. In effect, this meant granting visas on the back of spurious and demonstrably false claims. As one civil servant in the immigration and nationality directorate wrote in a letter this weekend,

"This is almost like the CPS"—

the Crown Prosecution Service—

"being told to destroy the papers in all prosecution cases, except where there is a 100 per cent. prospect of a conviction, so that the backlog can be cleared."

That is the view from the front line—not from the ministerial suite, but from the front line of the immigration and nationality directorate. If virtually all applications were being granted, how on earth can we believe the Minister's claim that the practice of rubber-stamping was rare and untypical?

The Immigration Minister also told the House that the decision to sanction such a policy was taken at a junior level in Sheffield. She told us that she had had nothing to do with it. This week we learned that the Minister had sanctioned a much broader policy. The memo that ordered civil servants to grant all applications over three months old stated:

"This exercise has been agreed by the Minister of State, Beverley Hughes."

So how can the Immigration Minister deny all knowledge of this practice, when she ordered it in the first place?

Mr. Watson: When the right hon. Gentleman received the e-mail from Bucharest on 8 March, did he consider it his duty to submit the evidence to the Sutton investigation? Why did he wait three weeks to bring it to the notice of the House?

David Davis: I could almost see the Whips' sheet in front of the hon. Gentleman when he was reading out the question. I have two points to make. I remind the hon. Gentleman and this arrogant Government that Ministers are accountable to Parliament, not the other way round. If the hon. Gentleman had listened to his own Home Secretary on the radio this morning, he would have heard him say that that was the responsible thing to do if one did not know the provenance of a piece of information. That is what I did until I could confirm the provenance of the document, which was last Wednesday night/Thursday. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman should talk to his own Home Secretary. He was the one who said that that was the right thing to do. The Whips' plants should get their act together.

I shall excite the Whips' plants now. In the past few days, documents that have been sent to me, which I am making public today, indicate that the decision to waive checks on ECAA applicants went wider and deeper than any previous memo suggests. These documents suggest that ministerial denials of responsibility are, frankly, incredible. I have given the Home Secretary a copy of the documents and placed a copy in the House of Commons Library. The story they tell is one of concerns ignored, warnings unheeded and objections overruled.

Last night the Minister of State claimed that she knew nothing of the allegations of the consul in Bucharest. That is difficult to believe when one looks at the facts. I have a letter written by Sir John Ramsden, a senior Foreign Office civil servant, to Chris Mace, who is the deputy director general of the immigration and nationality directorate. It was copied to Peter Wrench, the deputy director general in charge of policy. It is one of several accounts of the abuses of the ECAA scheme.

Let me read the House the key extracts. Sir John is writing about the ECAA scheme. He states:

"It clear from what they"—

the British Embassy in Bucharest—

"told me that this has developed into an organised scam that completely undermines our entry control procedures—and indeed makes a bit of a nonsense of having a visa regime."

He continues:

"Post had just received 70 virtually identical business plans . . . Interviewed applicants rarely knew what was in their business plans, typically explaining that these had been 'written by the solicitors.'"

The letter goes on:

"It was often clear that applicants had no idea about the trade they were supposed to be setting up in the UK. . . Post have to write long referral letters pointing out the flaws in the cases submitted to them . . ."

But the business case unit in the Home Office

"only rarely refuses applications. . . . Even those with a previous immigration history e.g. people caught submitting forged documents in the past have been accepted under the scheme."

He concludes:

"It is demoralising for our Post to have to devote a great deal of work to servicing a scam which makes them look ridiculous."

Mr. Blunkett: I do not dispute for a moment that such allegations are deeply serious and should be dealt with as such. Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that any Minister approved the actions that he describes—that where previous fraudulent activity had been identified and where there was clearly illegal action, Ministers had told staff that they should ignore it and wave through the application?

David Davis: Unfortunately, the Home Secretary has teed me up well for my next paragraph. The letter was written to the Minister's senior civil servants in November 2002, six months after the Immigration Minister was appointed to her position. Are the Government seriously suggesting that she was not told? In which case, who is running the Department?

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: In a moment.

Last night the Minister asked why the consul in Bucharest had not taken the matter up with his senior managers. Let me read to the House a letter that James Cameron wrote to the Home Office as far back as October 2002 to complain about the way in which ECAA applications were processed. He states that the Home Office

"judgement and decision making with regard to BCU/ECAA applications is a continual problem for overseas posts such as Sofia and Bucharest."

He continues:

"Many of the applicants have adverse immigration histories, administrative removals, suspect relationships, have applied after Leave To Remain has expired, and been working illegally in the UK for sometime prior to their ECAA application."

He goes on:

"As if this was not enough, most of our ECAA applicants have paid £1500–£2000 to a UK lawyer who 'guarantees' them a visa at the end of the application process.

The applicants rarely know what is in their business plan, cannot speak English, and have absolutely no knowledge or experience in the type of skills needed for respective businesses.

Unfortunately against our strongest recommendations,"

the Home Office

"continues to issue ECAA applications such as these."

Let us understand what this means in reality—what Mr. Cameron and his demoralised staff had to face. I shall give just a few examples of the people being let in under the scheme. I have concealed individual names to protect their identities. One example is a Ms A. who was a former British asylum seeker. All her claims for asylum and all her appeals were turned down in the mid-1990s. Facing deportation, Ms A. absconded. She was subsequently picked up by the police and removed from the UK in 1997—[Interruption.] Yes, picked up and removed. Exactly right—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must have order.

David Davis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I need protection.

Ms A. was not, one would have thought, an ideal candidate for the ECAA scheme, yet in October 2002 she was granted an entry visa to the UK under the scheme, under a Labour Government. Or consider Mr. N., whose application to the ECAA scheme was reviewed in March last year. The British embassy "strongly" recommended that Mr. N.'s application be refused because he had insufficient funds to support himself without recourse to public funds. The Home Office's response? "Entry cleared."

Many other examples of extraordinary ECAA applications include not least a range of builders who know nothing about bricks and mortar, and electricians who know nothing about electricity. A common factor in these applications was an inability to speak English. And the Home Office response? "Entry cleared."

Hugh Bayley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: No, I will not. I have given up.

Those are not one-off examples. It is an organised scam. It is well run and well known to the Home Office, yet instead of being tightened since these examples, the rules have been weakened. Yesterday the Home Secretary made a statement on organised crime. This is a prime example of organised crime. One of the excuses given by the Minister and the Prime Minister was that the vast majority of ECAA cases were already in the country legally, but that was all part of the scam.

I have a letter from the British embassy in Bulgaria to the immigration and nationality directorate in Croydon. It lists the names of 48 people who applied to come to the UK for four to six-day holiday visits from Bulgaria, with an organisation called Delfi Tours.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: No, I will not—I want to finish this point.

More than three quarters of those who came to the UK on those holiday visas applied for ECAA status and never returned to Bulgaria. The vice-consul points out that Delfi Tours is "just one agency of about 40 we have on a list."

The letter states that that

"is clear evidence of organised human trafficking for economic migration from Eastern Europe . . . If this does not demonstrate the enormity of the problem and that something should be done about the ECAA problem sooner rather than later, I don't know what would. It is surely high time Ministers were addressed and the policy of 'switching' in country removed altogether".

The letter also states:

"It is no wonder that our daily work is now confined mainly to the depressing task of processing ECAA main applications, ECAA dependants, family visits to ECAA members, or hapless visitors or businessmen with forged documents and increasingly credulous applications to visit the UK with the sole purpose of working there . . . Many local agencies and legal firms in the UK are now jumping on the ECAA bandwagon and submitting mass applications here for applicants with horrendous previous local or UK immigration records, as it is widely and correctly perceived that it is easier to get into the UK under the Agreement that it is to go on a visit."

That letter was from the British vice-consul in Sofia to the immigration and nationality directorate in Croydon, and it was sent on 20 October 2002. How can Ministers seriously claim that they knew nothing about that?

I will give way to the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Geraint Davies), who has a constituency point.

Geraint Davies: When the right hon. Gentleman was Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, he signed off a report showing that the previous Government's legacy on immigration was a computer system that did not arrive—hundreds of staff were sacked during that wait—and the loss of hundreds of files when the whole department moved from one office to another. Given that history and his intention to cut £600 million from the Home Office's budget, will he accept that the prospects of his managing the system any better are next to nil?

David Davis: Rather sadly, coming from an ex-member of the Public Accounts Committee, barely a point in that intervention was correct. The hon. Gentleman omitted to mention that the Passport Agency was famously computerised under this Government, and as a result one could not get a passport to leave the country—everybody could get in, but one could not get out. [Interruption.]

Geraint Davies rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

David Davis: I think that Mr. Speaker is protecting the hon. Gentleman from me.

We are discussing a massive well organised migration scam that civil servants had drawn to the attention of the Home Office, but Ministers did nothing about it. That is the central allegation that the Home Secretary must answer.

When my office spoke to Mr. Cameron last Thursday, he said that the concerns he raised could easily have been brought to my attention by any one of his demoralised staff. As the man in charge, however, he felt he should be the one to raise them. Frankly, he is a very brave man: at the end of the day, the buck stops with him, and the Minister should learn something from that.

This is not a question of one or two operational failures; what we have witnessed over the past month is an extraordinary outbreak of incidents that are symptomatic of a catastrophic failure of the system. It is a story of committed and loyal civil servants struggling to make a failing system work, and having their cries for help ignored.

Hugh Bayley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman is being ignored, so he knows how the civil servants feel.

Three weeks ago, I said that there had either been collusion, cover-up or simple incompetence; I am beginning to believe that it was all three.

I am glad to see that the Home Secretary recognised the magnitude of the problem this morning. That is why, as I understand it, he has announced a major investigation, with staff being sent to Bucharest and Sofia—the problem is here, not there—and the setting up of a hotline for civil servants who want to reveal problems without being set about by the Government public relations machine. I welcome those measures, which belatedly begin to recognise the size of the problem.

The Home Secretary must make a decision, however. Either he believes that what I have described is the result of systemic operational failure, in which case the Minister is to blame, or it is a failure of policy, in which case he is to blame. Whichever it is, somebody should shoulder responsibility for this disaster.

1.5 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"congratulates the Government on having embarked on radical end to end reform of the immigration and asylum system including strengthening border controls, reducing asylum intake by more than half, increasing immigration removals to record levels and speeding up the processing of applications for leave to remain in the UK; notes that, as indicated in a statement published by the Government on 29th March, all Governments have instituted reasonable and proportionate measures to deal with backlogs of applications by people already in this country for permission to extend their stay; and applauds the fact that the Government, by investing more staff resources than ever before, has reached the point where the Backlog Reduction Accelerated Clearance Exercise (BRACE) is no longer necessary."

The allegations are serious and concern sensitive issues with profound implications for attitudes to immigration and for the actions of the Government, both now and in the future. [Interruption.] It is no good Conservative Members shouting, "Hear, hear", because they will not get any jokes or knockabout—these matters should be treated with the gravity that they deserve. This is not a knockabout occasion; this is supposed to be a serious debate. [Interruption.] When children shout, "Get on with it", they do themselves no service.

We should have a grown-up debate and examine the issues with the gravity that they deserve, and we should also understand the concerns that the issues raise with the public. Whatever the knockabout in this House, the concerns of the public affect not only how we do business but race and community relations, and wider immigration policy.

We should conduct the debate carefully: we should not duck the issues or underestimate the concerns, but we should not play into the hands of the British National party either.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South) (Lab): I do not recognise the system described by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis). I have to deal with many immigration and asylum cases in my constituency, and it is still exceedingly difficult for people from certain countries to get into the United Kingdom either to settle or as visitors, so I do not understand the big picture that he is painting. If, however, what he says contains some truth—it appears that it does—will the Home Secretary put the issue into perspective by discussing the order of magnitude of the people whom we are talking about compared with people who want to come to the United Kingdom from all parts of the world either to settle or as visitors?

Mr. Blunkett: I will happily do that for my hon. Friend and the House, and I intend to work through the allegations one by one. Today, I have announced the suspension of all applications from Romania and Bulgaria, and the fast track has already been suspended, as those who are familiar with the issue will know. I am instigating an immediate further inquiry, and, as the shadow Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), has said, I have indicated that staff should immediately go to Bucharest and Sofia to examine the further allegations.

Had the claims been made available to the Sutton inquiry, we would have taken them into account from 8 March. Unfortunately, the claims were not available, but as I indicated on the radio this morning, we are setting up a hotline and a website so that those who do not want to use the existing whistleblower procedures can feel free to speak without intimidation. That may disappoint The Sunday Times and other newspapers, because staff will have to report things through the system, not outside it. I promise them, however, that any allegations will be dealt with properly and sensitively.

We will pick up on the work of the National Criminal Intelligence Service. That was mentioned in Mr. Cameron's e-mail, which indicated that it was doing an excellent job—as it was, on the back of the conference that was held with the Foreign Office in November 2002 on dealing with the problems and opportunities of developments in south-east Europe. That was part of our recognition of the fact that organised criminality would undermine the case for accession to the European Union, undermine proper immigration procedures, and undermine our attack on drug smuggling. That led to allegations of the kind that have been reiterated today.

I mention the conference in November 2002 because the fresh material—not fresh in the sense that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden has had it for a long time, but in the sense that he has put it into the public arena—relates very much to what was happening in autumn 2002. Yes, Chris Mace and Peter Wrench did work for the Department then, but they have not done so for some considerable time. [HON. MEMBERS: "So what?"] Conservative Members should not assume that we disagree with them just because they have a political hare running. Some of us agree that action should have been taken. Some of us—including the Minister of State and me—believe that if material is placed before senior management they should act on it. We are talking about allegations of fraud and forged documents. People who use false papers and have an immigration history that rules them out should be ruled out. It does not require a great deal of intelligence to recognise that, just common sense. [Interruption.] I hear another sedentary intervention saying that my right hon. Friend the Minister is to blame. How on earth can one blame her for actions taken in relation to the failure to follow through on allegations of the magnitude that I have described and have been alleged by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden?

The e-mail that was revealed last night was sent by Mr. Cameron on 8 March. That coincides exactly with the day on which my right hon. Friend the Minister set up the review to examine these issues. I do not dispute for a moment that the shadow Home Secretary did not know who had sent the e-mail, and I do not doubt his word in terms of its not being revealed until last Thursday, but I do think that it was irresponsible, having had that document and others, not to have placed them before the Sutton review.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): So it is all our fault, then?

Mr. Blunkett: I thought that we had all agreed that where fraud, deception, forgery and illegal action need to be dealt with, we all have a responsibility to do so.

Mr. Blunkett: I shall give way in a moment to the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), who will have apoplexy if I do not, but I just want to make it clear that responsibility is not confined to Ministers: we all have an obligation. I simply put myself in the position of the shadow Home Secretary and ask whether I would want to make mischief—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are so many voices in the Chamber that I cannot hear the Home Secretary. I should be able to hear the Home Secretary. I say again, as I have said before, that shouting is unacceptable in the House.

Mr. Blunkett: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, although I am not worried about being shouted at.

Were I to be in the shadow Home Secretary's position, I would certainly want to cause maximum embarrassment to the Government. Oppositions do that—we did it ourselves. However, I would have questioned my conscience as to whether, having received material and held it for several weeks, I would have been honour-bound to present it not to me, the Home Secretary, but to Ken Sutton.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I point out to the Home Secretary that I am listening very quietly, unusually for me. As a former Minister, I, like many of my colleagues, was subjected by this Government, when they were in opposition, to a two-year full public inquiry chaired by the Master of the Rolls, with all ministerial papers being made available. I refer of course to the BSE inquiry. I have no objection to having been put through that exercise, but I remind the Home Secretary that not one Minister who was subject to that inquiry sought at any time to blame any official. During our term of office, the buck stopped with Ministers, and we recognised that fact.

Mr. Blunkett: But I do not remember a single Minister resigning. I remember that BSE cost the country billions of pounds, that it cost people a great deal of misery, and that there were very many allegations, but I do not remember the Secretary of State or any Minister resigning. [Interruption.] Hon. Members are shouting that they were exonerated. Well, my right hon. Friend the Minister has been exonerated. [HON. MEMBERS: "No, she has not."] Yes, she has. This is not simply a matter of protecting my integrity or that of my right hon. Friend or other Ministers: it is about the confidence that the public need to have and about the morale of staff in dealing with such issues as they undertake a difficult job. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden said, "We value the staff, we have confidence them, and we applaud them for their courage." So do we. We have, above all, a duty of care to our staff, and we have not sought to blame them for what has happened. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes, you have."] No, we have not. We have sought to get to the root of the allegations that were made in relation to specific measures that were taken, why they were taken, and who authorised them to be taken, even if we understand why they were taken. There is a difference.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): As the internal inquiry was unable to consider the Cameron e-mail, will the Home Secretary come to the Dispatch Box and agree to a full independent inquiry so that it can be considered?

Mr. Blunkett: I am already at the Dispatch Box announcing the measures that we intend to take and the way in which we will deal with the material: we will of course make it publicly available.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): The Secretary of State said a moment ago that Ministers have not sought to pin the blame on officials. Was he not present for the statement that his right hon. Friend the Minister made to this House about a month ago, when she specifically indicated that officials, not herself, were responsible for what had gone wrong? She should know what is happening in her part of the Department. If she is not in full control of the situation, that suggests that she is not up to the job.

Mr. Blunkett: I am sorry, but I intend to deal with the specific allegations one by one; trying to slur the Minister does not shed any light on the situation—

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con) rose—

Mr. Blunkett: I want to make some progress before I give way again.

We need to get a bit of light on the issue, as well as heat, so I am happy to deal with the facts. I remind the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) that I was not in the Chamber for my right hon. Friend's statement because I was in the United States; otherwise, I would have made the statement myself. I have read it, however, and the truth is that she simply gave the facts. There is a big difference between trying to get to the facts and blaming staff, as was illustrated by the example of BSE that was cited a moment ago. Somebody had made the decisions, so somebody was to blame, but in the end nobody was blamed. Well, fair do's: if nobody is to blame for anything, nobody is accountable for anything. We are accountable and responsible for our policies. I am responsible and accountable even when I have not devised the policies because that is our constitution, which goes back a very long way. As someone who did politics at university, I am fully familiar with its niceties.

Let me deal with the context of the events. For example, let us consider the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden that we inherited a golden era of immigration and asylum control. In fact, we inherited a complete shambles in 1997. The previous Government did not have an electronic fingerprinting system; they had a computer that had broken down, and it took 20 months to process the initial decision on asylum compared with two months now. There were 54,000 outstanding cases whereas there is now less than half that number. Fewer than 9,000 people were removed every year, whereas last year we removed 17,000 asylum seekers as well as 12,000 other illegal immigrants. If the Opposition want to bandy words about who inherited a shambles and who did something about that, we are happy to do so.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Citizenship and Immigration has been instrumental in turning the system around in the past 18 months. She has ensured that, instead of a 45 per cent. increase in asylum claims, there has been a 50 per cent. drop in the past year. [Interruption]. I mention asylum only because there has been a clever attempt to combine the word "asylum" with the immigration allegations that have been made in the past three weeks, to the point where even a BBC political reporter did that on the news yesterday. That is not surprising because some of the newspapers that have jumped on the bandwagon have hinted—they have not told lies because not telling the truth is good enough for them—that the matter related to the asylum system rather than entry clearance, and to those who were already in the country and having their cases reaffirmed. [HON. MEMBERS: "Blame civil servants and the media."] I was not blaming anybody but simply pointing out that there is a desire to confuse the system. It exists because some people deeply oppose any inward immigration to this country.

Mr. Osborne: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I shall in a moment. When we published our White Paper two years ago, we set out a clear, balanced policy and a comprehensive approach to immigration, nationality and asylum. We said that we wanted to clamp down on those who entered the country clandestinely. We wanted people who did not have a legitimate asylum claim to apply openly and legitimately to come into the country to work.

Mr. Blunkett: I shall give way in a moment. People inside and outside the House have opposed that balanced policy throughout. I want to make it clear that we are sticking to it. Whatever the allegations, whatever the truth of the matter, we shall not be diverted into believing that everybody who applies to enter our country—those who want to work or happen to have a foreign name, a different nationality or religion—is somehow suspect and up to no good, and should be rejected.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): The Home Secretary spoke of the importance of good community relations. All hon. Members agree with that. However, does he accept that the failure to remove 250,000 failed asylum seekers since 1997 has the potential fatally to undermine the ability to build good community relations in this country?

Mr. Blunkett: Doubling the removals of those who are not here legitimately has helped. Identity cards would be a major step forward in ensuring that we knew who was in the country, whether they were entitled to services and whether they had been authorised to draw on those services. It would also make the reinstitution of embarkation procedures, which the previous Government abandoned, at least a possibility. At the moment, it is not.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): There are two central issues. The first is the specific charges of fraud, which need to be fully investigated; the second is that we have deliberately misused the European Community Association Agreements system, which the previous Government introduced. It has been put to me that the charge constitutes nothing more than naked opportunism. If there is any substance in the allegations, surely we need to know what happened when the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was Home Secretary. Should not we be able to compare the previous Government's policy with the current one? Should not all documents and memos that relate to that period be disclosed so that everyone in the country can see the whole picture and the whole truth?

Mr. Blunkett: The Freedom of Information Act 2000 will allow that to happen next year.

Mr. Osborne: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Blunkett: In a moment. I simply want to make the point clearly that we need a properly managed, correctly authorised and accurately reported asylum and nationality system that rejects those who should not be in the country but welcomes those who should.

I want to deal specifically with the four issues that the media raised in the past few weeks.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): Before my right hon. Friend moves on, I want to make a point about responsibility. Will he cast his mind back to the backlog clearances that took place in the past and remember who was responsible for conducting them in 1993? The details were never made public. Yet the results of such exercises in the past few years have been announced and Ministers have clearly stated the criteria for them.

Mr. Blunkett: We all remember who was Home Secretary in 1993 and we shall remind the public of that repeatedly between now and the general election. We are dealing not with naked opportunism, to use the term of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe), but opportunism clothed in concern by those who want to get it right only when it suits them to put the evidence in the public arena.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Osborne: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I shall do so once and then I shall deal with the four allegations.

Mr. Cameron: Given the state of affairs that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) described, will the Home Secretary give a guarantee that anyone else who comes forward to tell him what is happening in his Department, about which he apparently does not know, will not be suspended or sacked?

Mr. Blunkett: I have made it clear that people who use the normal whistleblower procedure or the new hotline will not be disciplined for producing evidence. Let us show some maturity: I do not know everything that goes on, with the tens of thousands of people that my Department employs directly or indirectly. Any politician who pretended that they did would be stupid or duplicitous. We are neither.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I shall in a moment but first I want to deal with the four allegations. Two were straightforward and would not normally have been viewed as a cause celebre and, as I said earlier, two raised profound issues that need to be tackled. The first of the latter was the Moxon allegations. Whatever that individual's background and whatever statements he may have made, he deserved to be taken seriously. The review was set up to examine what he had alleged. The allegations related to the accession countries and what would happen before 1 May.

It was alleged that fast-tracking had been authorised to get people through the system and thus reduce the number of people who were seen to come in and register after 1 May. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State's head was supposedly on the block and her resignation was called for because of that. First, the allegations were proved to be entirely untrue: she had not authorised any change in practice in relation to fast track. Secondly, 80 per cent. of the cases were of people already in the country whose stays were being reauthorised. Even if one is not terribly intelligent, it is not difficult to understand that one cannot fast-track people into the country who are already here. Therefore, one cannot be accused and found guilty of fiddling the figures—that was the allegation—so that those people would not be counted from 1 May. Despite all the hysteria, that allegation did not stand up to scrutiny.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): The civil servant who made the original allegations, who reportedly believes that Muslims will need to be dealt with by nuclear weapons, is today quoted as saying that the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration is "not long for the political world".

Does my right hon. Friend think that that is a matter for a civil servant to decide? How confident is he that there is no political agenda involved?

Mr. Blunkett: I am trying desperately to keep the debate on a level that addresses facts and issues. People will have to draw their own conclusion both about behaviour in the Chamber and how people have been dealing with these matters outside. The facts in relation to the case that was put by Mr. Moxon, whose subsequent revelations will lead people to make judgments about his motives, need to be set aside.

After the Moxon suggestions, we had the e-mail from Mr. James Cameron, which was sent, as I understand it, on 8 March. As I spelled out, that was the day on which the review began. Incidentally, that was just four days after Mr. Cameron had been in the same room as one of my senior officials in Bucharest, along with others, talking about the very issues that we are debating this afternoon.

On 1 and 2 March, Mr. Cameron was quite properly in a meeting with a senior official from my Department. That official was seeking to get to the truth about the allegations and behaviour involved. When he came back, he wrote a note indicating that he would take action on the appropriate lines to ensure that the allegations were properly investigated. As he had indicated that, I was surprised to learn that, four or five days later, these allegations were made as if no one had been listening or taken any action at all—[Interruption.] No, I am not smearing anyone. Perhaps it would be better if I did not give the facts so people could just have their prejudices. I am merely speiling out that tightening checks and investigating concerns are not the prerogative of the Opposition. It happens that my staff were, rightly, concerned about that and prepared to act on it. Therefore, the Cameron allegations must be taken seriously, unlike the second allegation, which was about the backlog reduction accelerated clearance exercise.

Mr. Osborne: If there were concerns about the Cameron allegations before they were expressed in the e-mail, why were they not investigated by the Sutton inquiry? In addition, if the Secretary of State is in charge of his Department, why do so many civil servants feel that they must send missives to the Opposition? Why do civil servants in his Department feel that they cannot use internal channels to raise their concerns?

Mr. Blunkett: First, Mr. Cameron is not a member of my staff, but that does not change the issue. We should not bandy words about which civil servants leaked what to whom, because we had a bellyful of receiving e-mails and faxes when we were in opposition, some of which were accidental, as the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) will recall, including finding her diary and handing it back to her. I put that on the record because it is important to show that politicians have some integrity. We remember what we received and did not receive from nefarious sources when we were in opposition, and that will continue.

I will come back to James Cameron in a moment. The second allegation was about the clearance exercise, which was not only in line with practice developed from the late 1980s, as was described a moment ago, but entirely sensible and in accord with the practice that we would have expected to be laid down, not necessarily authorised by current Ministers but certainly authorised in the past by Ministers. The second call for my right hon. Friend to resign was therefore absolutely spurious, and had no basis in fact.

The third allegation was even more ridiculous and concerned applications for citizenship. With security checks still in place, character checks and references still taken up, full immigration history still undertaken, and after a risk assessment and 100 per cent. tally with passport checks on visits overseas, it was decided not to recall people's passports that had already been in the possession of staff dealing with those cases. Again, a call was made for my right hon. Friend's resignation on a completely spurious issue designed to muddy the waters on the premise that if one flings enough mud, repeats things often enough, and feeds something into the equation on a daily, weekly or Sunday Times basis, eventually something will stick.

I want to make something clear. The Sunday Times, the Tory party and anyone else can keep on throwing mud, but my right hon. Friend is not resigning, she is not being sacked and she has the total support of this side of the House and everyone who has dealt with her.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is right to pinpoint The Sunday Times, which is full of dishonesties and inaccuracies on stories of this nature. This one was particularly untrue. Is he aware that its editor is a man called John Witherow, of whom the vast majority of the public will not have heard because of his hiding behind a wall of privacy? He is fond of misleading the public and charging them money for the privilege of being misled, but has never thought about resigning himself. I can tell my right hon. Friend that in 100 years, not one editor has resigned for giving inaccurate information or lying to the public—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. That was far too long. The Home Secretary has got the point.

Mr. Blunkett: My hon. Friend, in his usual acerbic way, makes a point. My relations with The Sunday Times are bad enough as they are, so I will not make them any worse by commenting on it.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): My right hon. Friend was describing the process that has been under way over the last few weeks. Does he recall that, a few moments ago, the shadow Home Secretary claimed that not until this weekend did he know about previous backlog clearance exercises? Would he be interested to know that on 14 March, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration gave evidence to the Home Affairs Committee, at which she spoke openly about the BRACE exercise? Would he also be interested to know that in the audience when she said that was the shadow Home Secretary? Does the Home Secretary agree that, although these issues are serious, some of the outrage is a trifle synthetic?

Mr. Blunkett: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend. The allegations included one that my right hon. Friend the Minister would not come to the House, as if she had not just been in front of the Home Affairs Committee, answered the private notice question, dealt with Home Office questions at the beginning of last week—[Interruption.] Of course, we took it for granted. I am merely advising colleagues about the allegations that she had not done so. I heard those allegations on the radio. One can say things on the radio and be heard. That is a fact; I have discovered it. Those things can be recorded and used in evidence against one, which is why programmes such as "Question Time" and "Any Questions" are so boring nowadays. One has to be so careful about what one says, which makes life much less entertaining.

[Mr. Blunkett]

Let me return to something that is not at all entertaining—

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): May I say something before my right hon. Friend does that? I do not think that I could be described by any Member as a Whips' woman, but may I now say how delighted I am that my right hon. Friend has defended the Minister of State so vigorously? As a humble Back Bencher who deals with her Department regularly, may I say that she probably has the worst job in Government, but that she does it extremely well? She is always available and is a very committed Minister.

Mr. Blunkett: I could not have put it better myself, and someone who is normally the scourge of the Front Bench is probably the best person to say it.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): The Home Secretary has described the exemplary record of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes) as a Minister. May I record my appreciation, and that of my constituents, of the timely, courteous and entirely proper way in which she has dealt with immigration inquiries that I have raised with her? I am sure that Members in all parts of the House share my experience.

Mr. Blunkett: I entirely agree. But let me now return to Mr. James Cameron, because the allegations are genuinely serious and require action.

I said that Mr. Cameron had been at a meeting with one of my senior officials in Bucharest at the beginning of March. Shortly before that meeting, a clearly undesirable lawyer had been arrested. As the shadow Home Secretary said, the lawyer has been involved in fraud and unacceptable illegal dealings relating to entry to this country from Romania and Bulgaria. This individual was picked up at the end of February, a week before the e-mail was sent, and will appear in court on 29 April. That was part of the ongoing National Criminal Intelligence Service work that Mr. Cameron was generous enough to mention at the end of his e-mail.

I have mentioned both the NCIS work and the lawyer's arrest to show that, far from being behind the door, my officials, the enforcement agencies and all concerned have been working assiduously to try and ensure that the right things are done. One of the allegations—that lawyers were not being pursued, and the enforcement and intelligence agencies were not doing their job—was quite simply untrue. If it is true that staff in Sheffield were dealing with matters in an unwarranted fashion, we must look into that, and look into who gave the instruction. I agree that low-level staff should not be blamed for what is not of their making.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I will in a moment, but I want to finish the point.

In February, middle managers in Sheffield were concerned about fast-track clearing from Bulgaria and Romania, so they reverted to more detailed assessment. I have announced today that we are stopping all entry from Romania and Bulgaria, because that should be done while we get this right. When I met the Romanian Prime Minister last year, we stressed—as we stressed to the Interior Minister two weeks ago—that part of the movement towards full accession and the lifting of visa regimes from Romania and Bulgaria would depend on getting to grips with criminality, illegal and forged documentation and an atmosphere and culture that lead naturally to suspicion.

Kevin Brennan: My right hon. Friend speaks of necessary measures, but in the long term is it not right to bear it in mind that many immigrants from Romania have made a great contribution to the United Kingdom—not least Mr. Bernat Hecht, the father of the Leader of the Opposition, who cannot be blamed for the subsequent sins of his son?

Mr. Blunkett: I certainly do not want any of my sons to be blamed for my activities.

Let me put this on record. As soon as the lawyer was arrested at the end of February, staff in Sheffield—sensibly, from their point of view—not only suspended dealing with cases that had been handled by him, but recalled those that had already been dealt with. Our staff are caring. They do give a damn. They wanted to get this right, and—I say this very forcefully—they were not under instructions from any Minister to do other than follow the procedure, deal with the law and uphold what we would consider to be decent, proper, professional standards.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): A few moments ago, the Home Secretary spoke of his dealings with the Romanian Prime Minister last year, and a strong reprimand—my word, but I think that it summarises the position reasonably—or warning to him about the dangers of improper practice in relation to visa applications. If the Home Secretary made those remarks to the Romanian Prime Minister at that time, presumably he did so following advice from officials in or around Bucharest, and from his own Department. If he had that advice, why did Mr. Cameron's revelations this month apparently come as a surprise that required a complete reversal of policy?

Mr. Blunkett: The specific allegations made by Mr. Cameron go much further than allegations made previously. The e-mail does not simply say what Mr. Cameron said to my senior official at the meeting, or what was said to his immediate colleagues. In the light of that, and in the light of the mistrust, misapprehension and concern that now exist among the public—understandably, given what they have been reading—it is sensible to try and bottom this once and for all.

Yes, I did know that there were difficulties. Jointly with the Foreign Office, we had a conference here in London attended by Prime Ministers from all over south-eastern Europe. The publicity is on record and shows that we discussed the real issues of organised crime that we debated here yesterday afternoon. I was surprised that the revelations came after that statement rather than as part of it, because we are dealing with exactly the issues of trans-border and cross-border organised criminality that we discussed yesterday. It is because of such issues that we are establishing the serious organised crime agency. We have been aware of them, and the Romanians themselves are aware of them. That is why they have been prepared to work so closely with NCIS and to have our staff working with them on both immigration and border controls and on drug enforcement.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has made one of the most sensible points that we have heard in all this. In the context of migration from south-east Europe, we know that we are dealing with criminality and possibly even with terrorism. The allegation that our right hon. Friend the Minister of State would collude in that is not just ridiculous but goes so far over the top that I think Opposition Members should consider their own position. Having alleged a lack of integrity on the part of our right hon. Friend, unless they can demonstrate that she had a motive, the charge is not against her but against the Opposition Front Benchers.

Mr. Blunkett: My hon. Friend has put his finger on a central issue. If, for the fourth time, there is a call for my right hon. Friend's resignation, on what basis is it made? To substantiate it—having not substantiated the three earlier calls—those issuing it would have to show that she had authorised or condoned the actions that Mr. Cameron alleged to be taking place, which are now to be investigated and about which a further allegation has been made this afternoon by the shadow Home Secretary. There has to be some route back from the authorisation or condoning of the sort of gross illegality that has been alleged. That is why I agree that making allegations is easy, but providing facts to back them up is much more difficult.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con) rose—

Mr. Blunkett: I will give way in case a fact is about to emerge.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way. He has now twice told the House that on 8 October one of his senior officials went to Bucharest to investigate what was going on there. Was that a routine investigation and, if not, why was the Sutton inquiry not asked to investigate those matters, too? Does it not show that the Sutton inquiry was not in possession of the full facts and therefore not a thorough inquiry?

Mr. Blunkett: I said that my senior official went on 1 and 2 March, and I pointed out that the Sutton review was about the first of the spurious allegations and was being investigated. The subsequent allegations, including those made in the e-mail sent on 8 March, but not revealed by the shadow Home Secretary until last night, were an entirely different issue. I have already said that the blending of all the different issues together is understandable as clever politics, but it is wholly a tactic rather than a reality of fact.

I have therefore disentangled points one, two and three this afternoon. We dealt with the first through the review; the second and third were spurious and, in any case, conformed to the practice of previous Home Secretaries—of which, incidentally, I approve and take responsibility for. The fourth is now about to be investigated. Those are all nothing more than allegations against a Minister who has done so much to reinforce our border controls, and to tackle—she will announce it in a few days' time—months of work on sham marriages, bogus student applications and the lack of proper controls that we inherited from the previous Government. She has done a fantastic job on turning round the asylum system. Of course, our opponents, who have to move on to the next issue, have tried to present what we have been doing in getting a grip on the system as a shambles.

Those who have made the allegations this afternoon have failed to make their case. They have failed to demonstrate the facts and failed to demonstrate again and again that calls for my right hon. Friend's resignation were justified. That is why we stand four-square behind her. We are getting to the truth by all means and reassuring people that we know what we are doing. We are ensuring that we have a balanced nationality, immigration and asylum policy, and we are proud of the work that we have been able to do so far. We are determined to ensure that no one undermines that policy, whether through illegal activity outside our country, through sloppy work inside it, through lawyers—I have indicated that a lawyer has been arrested—or through a failure of enforcement.

All of that will be taken into account in the review, but, in the end, we have to make a judgment. Has the Minister of State done a first-class job? We all know that she has, so the answer to that question is yes, yes, yes. That is why she has our unequivocal backing and will continue to do so.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): This is a serious debate, and I am glad that the Home Secretary has acknowledged that some of the issues raised, particularly in the most recent allegations, are indeed serious. I wish to examine the allegations in some detail and also examine some of the operations taking place in the Department, particularly those of the immigration and nationality directorate. There have been calls for the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration to resign, so I shall also look at some of the reasons behind those demands for her resignation.

Before I go into the detail, I would like to make a general observation about the climate in which the debate is taking place. I am convinced that if we did not live in a society where issues of migration, asylum and immigration were sometimes deliberately muddled and confused, and where we had to respond to so much nonsense in the tabloid press, some of the misunderstandings and the actions of individual civil servants would not have happened in the first place. In a climate where politicians and Ministers are so frightened to explain transparently and in some detail what they are planning to do—in other words, their precise intentions on asylum and migration—the real issues will be buried and hidden away, leading to the sort of confusions that have emerged over the last couple of weeks. I believe that all sides have a responsibility to improve the quality of debate on asylum and migration issues, so that we do not end up with the sort of debate that we are having now—a debate that is the consequence of the climate in which we live.

Clearly, the allegations that have emerged over the past three or four weeks are of serious concern. This country cannot have a system of immigration that is open to different levels of interpretation in different Government offices and that is not transparent. The House should be able to know exactly what Government policy on immigration is and we should not allow decisions to be taken, as it would appear, without clear ministerial approval.

The issues are complex and hard to understand, so I want to look in detail at the three basic allegations that have been made. The first could be described as the Moxon/Sheffield set of allegations. In layman's terms, they suggest that a policy was in place to fast-track in-country applications from EU accession country nationals. It is alleged that rather than going through the usual detailed paper process, a simpler application base was used and that the policy was put in place not necessarily to deal with a three-month backlog, but from day one in order to speed up the process. Sutton has investigated that and I am happy to accept Sutton's conclusion that, on the specific allegations made by Moxon, the Minister did no wrong.

The second allegation can best be described as The Sunday Times memo. It was written by Graham Austin and Moira Bing to senior immigration officials at the casework directorate at Croydon. Again in layman's terms, it suggests that there is a policy to waive through immigration applications if they take more than three months and that those applications are for a range of permits—family visits, spouses, domestic workers and so forth. The memo stated:

"As there is a large number of applications that are over three months old waiting to be decided it has been agreed at ministerial level that an enhanced procedure should be undertaken to clear these as quickly as possible."

It goes on clearly to state that the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration approved the exercise. It is alleged that there was a new procedure for fast-track applications. Even though that was not examined by the Sutton inquiry, I am prepared to accept the Home Office view that it was not a new policy, but standard practice which had been applied to in-country applications for some time.

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): For the record, Ken Sutton explicitly dealt with the backlog reduction accelerated clearance exercise. Many people may have read my ministerial statement and various commentaries, but not the Sutton report itself. If they read it, they would find that it refers expressly to BRACE and its predecessor.

Mr. Oaten: I am grateful for that clarification. My understanding was that the particular allegations and the memo presented to The Sunday Times had not been submitted to Sutton and that we had therefore not had independent clarification of the allegation by a national newspaper, which we did have in respect of the Moxon/Sheffield case.

Beverley Hughes: For further clarification, the particular minute dealt with my intervention in the case of Mrs. Martin, which Members will recall arose about a year ago. Mrs. Martin was an American woman who came here with her British husband after the second world war. She had lived here for 40 years and had several children. Under BRACE, taking a decision on the basis of the papers, Mrs. Martin's case for settlement was refused because she could not prove that she had lived in the country for 40 years. I intervened to say that that was not a sensible decision in cases such as hers. I said that such a refusal on the basis of the papers under BRACE should be referred to a senior caseworker to ensure that it was a sensible decision.

Mr. Oaten: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for clarifying that point.

On the second allegation, which relates to The Sunday Times memo, I accept the Home Secretary's assertion that this procedure has been in place for some time. However, I have two concerns, the first of which relates to the word that he used yesterday on the Floor of the House. He said that such applications were "substantially" in-country applications. It would help if he clarified what he meant by "substantially". As I understand it, some 80 per cent. of applications are in-country, which means that some 20 per cent. are not. It is important that we do not simply assume that, in all such cases, we are simply recycling the numbers.

Mr. McCabe: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Do the official Opposition require a quorum when it is their motion that is being debated? I can see only four of them in the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, he is making a political point, not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Oaten: So, these applications are not just in-country applications. We need to acknowledge that a number of outside-country applications are involved.

The third allegation, which is by far the most serious, relates to the Cameron e-mail, as we might best describe it. Cameron clearly claims that normal checks were being waived in respect of certain countries that are among the next wave of EU member countries, and the Home Secretary is right to say that that claim is serious. Cameron's memo states that "no right-minded entry clearance officers would consider issuing a visa to these applications".

That hard-hitting statement raises a number of serious issues and, as the Home Secretary has acknowledged, concern also exists about the activities of certain lawyers. The Cameron memo also states that there is evidence that one lawyer helped more than 500 applicants. Incidentally, such help cost each client between £1,000 and £2,000. Those are serious allegations, and I should make it absolutely clear that we have no time for a system that allows clearly bogus applicants to fast-track the system in that way. We are also extremely concerned about the activities of certain lawyers, and when the Minister responds I hope that she can say a little more about what is being done to crack down on them. It is clear that a rip-off is taking place in some of those countries, and that there is another, hidden story behind the detail.

Those are the allegations, and although I accept that the Minister does not have a case to answer in respect of the first two, there is a strong need for a proper inquiry into the third. I am disappointed that the Home Secretary did not acknowledge that such an inquiry should be independent; instead, he wants to establish another internal Home Office inquiry.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we need to examine how a climate has been created within a Government Department in which such short cuts can be contemplated? Surely one reason is that this Government are being target-driven by public relations presentation, in order to justify certain policies in a difficult environment. That is one key reason why nobody has any confidence in what the Government say any more.

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point that touches on my opening remarks. While we live in this climate, which was caused in large part by his own party, Ministers will adopt a public relations, target-driven approach, rather than tackling and talking about the issues in an honest and up-front way.

Mr. Watson: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on taking on this issue in a cool and sober way, and on the fact that more Liberal Democrats are present than Conservatives, even though it is a Conservative-initiated debate. He talks about the need for a proper debate, but does he agree with the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who said that immigration was "an issue which we raised successfully in 1992 and again in the 1994 European election campaign. It played particularly well in the tabloids and has more potential to hurt"?

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this debate has more to do with Conservative PR than with the real issue of fraud?

Mr. Oaten: There are surely some among the so-called official Opposition who believe that this issue will help them to win votes at the next general election. However, it did not seem to do the Conservatives much good when they raised it during the 1997 and 2001 elections. So one of three allegations is serious and worthy of investigation, and I say again to the Home Secretary that I am disappointed that such an investigation will not be independent.

I turn to the allegation that is not talked about, but which constitutes the wider problem: the underlying culture within the Departments and the way in which they are run. The Sutton report considered this issue in some detail and raised a number of concerns. It is a great pity, incidentally, that the report was pushed out last week, on a day when endless Government announcements were made. As a result, it did not receive the coverage and detailed examination that it deserved. Sutton revealed a serious breakdown in the managerial process. Some of its recommendations are quite remarkable. Recommendation No. 5 says that the immigration and nationality directorate should produce for all staff a guidance note outlining how IND policy is developed. That is breathtaking. No Department should need to produce guidance notes on its own policy. If such guidance was necessary, it should have been provided ages ago, rather than being provided now in the form of a recommendation.

Recommendation No. 6 says that all staff new to IND at grade 7 or 6 should undergo training on policy and working with Ministers. It is breathtaking that such policy guidance and training was not in place to begin with. The fact that it was necessary for an internal inquiry to recommend that training be given to staff on how to work with Ministers illustrates that a complete failure has occurred.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman's point reinforces what I said earlier, and describes the difficulties that officials encounter in interpreting Ministers' policy guideline wishes. As a result, a breakdown in communication occurs, and such a breakdown is surely squarely the responsibility of both the Minister and the Secretary of State.

Mr. Oaten: One of two things is being demonstrated. The Department failed because proper training was not in place and policy guidance was not given to officials in the first place; or Ministers' new guidance is so complex, or it changes so quickly, that front-line staff have been unable to keep up. Whichever of those is true, it is clear that something has gone wrong.

Recommendation No. 7 is also breathtaking. It says that technical expertise should be included for those deciding cases. Of course it should. The implication—that those deciding cases did not have the technical expertise in the first place—is astonishing. If we are to have confidence in the system, the individuals involved in complex cases should have such expertise in the first place. Why were they allowed to do what is a complex job for such a long time without the necessary skills and knowledge? We should not need to wait for an internal inquiry to come up with such an obvious and basic recommendation. There is a serious case to answer in respect of that fourth allegation, but Sutton touches on only some of the managerial problems that existed.

I want to ask a few questions of the Minister and the Home Secretary, and to discuss the list placed by the Home Secretary in the Library last night concerning the backlog clearance process that has taken place since the 1980s. I acknowledge that that principle and that process began under Conservative Governments, but does the Home Secretary not accept that his Government have gone further than the Conservatives in respect of backlog clearing? Why was it decided that the BRACE scheme would kick in only after a 12-month delay? He has changed the guidelines, and the scheme now kicks in after a three-month delay. Is that not a clear acknowledgement that the system is getting out of control?

Can the Minister say more about the plan to tackle the clear pressure to which the IND is being subjected? In his Library note, the Home Secretary said that he believed that the introduction of charges for applications on leave to remain would give the IND an opportunity to invest more, and to move towards "high standards". It is true that from 1 August 2003, there has been a big increase in the charges for applications. Can the Minister explain where that money is going, how much money has been raised by that increase in the charge and how much money has gone directly to improving the quality of IND and exactly how many extra staff will be employed? There is clearly a pressure, a backlog and a burden on staff, and I hope that the Minister can explain how many additional staff will be employed to clear that backlog.

What is the position of the so-called whistleblowers? Where do Mr. Moxon and Mr. Cameron stand in relation to their employment? Are they both under investigation? What kind of hearing will they have? Have either of them broken any codes that they signed in relation to employment? Based on what I have heard in relation to Mr. Cameron, I have concerns about the way in which a consul or other diplomat, who must surely be privy to extremely privileged information, has operated in sending that e-mail.

While I want a system in place that protects whistleblowers, I acknowledge that some individuals, especially in consulates or embassies, hold positions of enormous trust. I do not necessarily argue that the two individuals who have been referred to should be reinstated. That is one of my concerns about the Conservative motion, which implies that those individuals should be praised as heroes and reinstated. I do not take that line, but I hope that the Minister will explain that they will be treated fairly and under which codes of conduct they will be processed.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for clarifying his attitude to civil servants. I welcome what he said about whistleblowers, but when it comes to disciplinary action is it not the duty of the House to avoid political interference? The matter should surely be one for the civil service.

Mr. Oaten: I entirely accept that. I hope that the process that the Minister sets out for any disciplinary action will be independent and clear and will be undertaken according to the proper codes. I am sure that it will.

Mr. David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman acknowledging that there is a proper process in place for whistleblowers to report their concerns and have them investigated and that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has announced extensions to that process with a website and a hotline? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that what we heard from the official Opposition earlier suggested that no such system was in place and that the only recourse for civil servants who are concerned about certain practices is to shoot off e-mails or messages to the press or the official Opposition?

Mr. Oaten: I do not accept that. Clearly, in this case, the individuals did not feel able to go to senior managers and they decided to send e-mails in a different direction. So there has been a problem with the process, and the climate in the Department is not one in which individuals feel that they can go through the proper process. For whatever reasons, the individuals involved felt that they had to go to the tabloid press or Opposition parties. So there is a problem that needs to be addressed.

Mr. Cameron: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that Mr. Moxon's options were effectively closed down because he sent an e-mail to the Minister's private office and received no answer for two months? He could not really go to his senior officials because they were the ones who had apparently introduced the illegal policy without consulting Ministers. What was he meant to do?

Mr. Oaten: I accept that Mr. Moxon made a number of attempts to send an e-mail to the Minister, but the process by which whistleblowers should raise a concern should not involve sending an e-mail to the Secretary of State or the Minister of State. They should understand that those Ministers will be bombarded by endless e-mails. If the system is to work properly, there has to be someone within an organisation whom employees can approach rather than having to go to a national newspaper or to a Minister. Clearly there has been a failure and it needs to be addressed. Proper procedures need to be put in place.

Mr. Watson: Given that it took the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) two weeks to answer his e-mails, can we forgive my colleague on the Front Bench for not taking note of some of hers?

Mr. Oaten: I am sure that none of us wants to examine how long it takes us to respond to e-mails at any given time.

As the Home Secretary has acknowledged, there was valid criticism of the Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen for jumping slightly too quickly in their relationship with Mr. Moxon. I am on the record as saying that I met Mr. Moxon in the morning and it was clear to me that he was a troublemaker. Just a few alarm bells started to ring in my mind. They did not seem to ring down the corridor in a different office. However, the Conservative Front-Bench team seems to have learned a lesson in relation to the Cameron e-mail. I accept, as the Home Secretary accepts, that it was right not to draw conclusions immediately from an e-mail—e-mails are not signed—but to take some time to check out the source. So on this occasion we can excuse the Conservatives for the delay in responding.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's generosity in taking yet another intervention. He has criticised the wording of the Opposition motion in a particular regard. Is it his opinion that the allegations made by the shadow Home Secretary—I wrote down the words that he used at the time—of "collusion", "cover-up" and "incompetence" are extremely serious when there is not a shred of evidence that the Minister of State or the Home Secretary authorised any such activity? Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the serious words used by the shadow Home Secretary?

Mr. Oaten: The hon. Lady has a valid point. The shadow Home Secretary was clear in the language that he used and the allegations that he made. I shall come shortly to those allegations and how they relate to the Minister of State. They are important. One of the only ways in which we shall clear up the allegations is to set up an independent review. The hothouse of allegations around here means nothing. An independent review could check whether such allegations have any merit.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman may agree that the evidence is already pretty clear that the Government have been at some pains at departmental levels to avoid publicising some of the things that they have been doing in relation to entry clearance. We have that on the documentation that has become available.

In terms of the Government's way of going about their business, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is already pretty clear that on that level there has been a cover-up?

Mr. Oaten: The phrase "cover-up" can be interpreted in many different ways. When it comes to the serious matter of asking a Minister to resign, do we believe that a general allegation that the Government have covered something up is a resigning issue? I argue that it is not. All Governments manage their stories to put across the best message. For goodness sake, if people had to resign for doing that, none of us would be left in this Chamber.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Apart from you.

Mr. Oaten: Not even me.

I move on to the timing in relation to the applicants who were so close to the 1 May deadline and EU accession. I understand that in a busy office with a pile of papers to go through one might say, "What is the point of rejecting this application when in just a few months, on 1 May, this national will have full EU membership? Let's just let this one go through." But the Government have a policy of taking other applications right up to the 30 April deadline. They have made it clear that for asylum applications from the Czech Republic the deadline should be 30 April. Surely there has to be some consistency. What guidance is being issued in relation to applicants from countries that are just a couple of weeks away from becoming EU members?

The Home Secretary has announced that he is suspending all immigration applications from Bulgaria and Romania. Is the Minister comfortable with that? Has the decision been legally checked? Is the process legal? Does she believe that the decision could be challenged legally? If it is legal and necessary due to the concerns of the Home Office, does she believe that there is a case for widening it to apply to other countries? Is she sure that the kind of practice that Mr. Cameron has exposed in Bulgaria and Romania is not taking place in other countries? Surely there is a case for the investigation that the Home Office has announced into those countries to be expanded to consider practice in other countries; otherwise, we may have to have another debate in six months' time, after we have had another leaked memo from a different consul in a different part of the world.

I come to the sensitive issue of the Minister's position. I have found the Minister to be able and polite, and during the passage of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Bill, my colleagues and I found her to be open, frank, honest, helpful, clear and plain-speaking. I have nothing but respect for the Minister. I have never, in seven years of doing this job, called for another politician to resign. That is done on a knee-jerk basis, far too often and I am uncomfortable with the constant calls for individuals to resign. However, on this occasion, I have had to consider the issue, because the press have asked me endlessly whether I support the Conservatives' calls for the Minister to resign.

In considering the issue, I have had to analyse several points. First, did the Minister ignore warnings from officials? The Sutton inquiry found that she did not ignore the warnings on the specific allegations and that in fact some of those warnings did not get through to her. On that ground, there is no case. Secondly, did the Minister mislead the House? That is one of the most serious allegations that can be made and is a reason for individuals to resign if they have done so. Again, despite some of the comments in the memo in The Sunday Times about the Minister knowing about the process, I am clear that there is a difference between her authorising that process and the allegations that were made when she came to the House on 8 March.

Thirdly, has the Minister got to grips with the management process? Sutton does set out some concerns about what is taking place in the Department. I know that the Minister has said on the airwaves that she has been responsible for sorting out the chaos and introducing procedures to try to improve matters. However, she still has a case to answer on some of the problems in her Department. Fourthly, should a Minister be held to account for managerial failures? That is the most complex and difficult question because increasingly Ministers say—with some justification—that something is an operational issue, and not a ministerial responsibility. However, the extension of that argument leads to questions of where democratic accountability lies and where the buck stops. There are concerns that the Minister has not got to grips with the managerial process.

In the circumstances, it does not appear to me that a case can be made for the Minister to resign. That is why we have not supported such calls. However—and I hope that the Minister and the Home Secretary will consider this—because of the public concern about what has happened in the Department, Ministers should agree to a full inquiry into the Cameron allegations, and a broadening of the remit of Sutton to examine the procedures in place in the immigration and nationality directorate. The concerns are so severe that a wider independent inquiry should take place. The Minister's future should be decided after that, and not in the hothouse of the television studios or the Chamber where it is too easy to call for resignations.

Those of us who wish to speak tolerantly about asylum and immigration—who wish to argue that the country is not going to be flooded and that we should have a mature debate—are undermined enormously if the information and figures from the Government are not accurate. That does not help us in making our case. That is why a full, independent and public inquiry into the facts should take place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should advise the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 12-minute limit on Back Bench speeches, which will apply from now on.

2.24 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): I am sorry to have to speak in this debate, because I had hoped for better from a Tory party led by the child of someone who was a refugee from Romania. However, if one has any expectations of the Tory party, one is frequently disappointed. My right hon. Friend the Minister is being pursued as part of a deliberate strategy by the Conservatives to stir up antipathy towards people coming to this country. The Conservatives do not give a damn about the damage that that does to community relations. As far as they are concerned, a few cheap hits in the House of Commons are worth it, even if they result in some expensive hits on the streets and estates of this country. Those of us who represent constituencies where various communities manage to live happily with one another—including intermarrying—are disgusted by that approach.

If people think that I exaggerate, all that I can do is remind them—as my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson) has already done—of the stated views of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) when he was director of the Conservative Research Department, even though he is now a shadow health spokesman. He said that immigration was to hurt whom? It might hurt the Labour party or the Liberal Democrats, but it will hurt most—many—of our fellow citizens and people who come to this country to try to earn a decent living in peaceful circumstances.

All over the world, since history began, there have been huge movements of population and they have always presented great difficulties. However, they have been a huge asset to this country. A book published a few years ago, with the strange title "Hitler's Gift", listed all the geniuses whom he drove out of Germany and eastern Europe to this country and north America. They transformed the standard of our mathematics and physics, and we left Germany and eastern Europe far behind. That was a permanent legacy.

We should also consider the people who have come to this country more recently and the benefits that they have brought to our fellow citizens. For example, Professor Sir Magdi Yacoub is the world's greatest heart surgeon and he is welcome. He contributes, and so do hundreds of thousands of other people who have come to this country and made it a better place. We should make them welcome, instead of indulging in cheap stunts in pursuit of Ministers, in the hope of some short-term, shoddy political gain.

Mr. Cameron: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I have only 12 minutes and I intend to use them.

The Government inherited a huge mess in immigration and asylum, with huge delays. The Conservatives apparently confused the amount of time taken to deal with applications with thoroughness, but the two are not necessarily related. The process was not thorough, but it did take a devil of a long time. The Government have set about tackling that problem and have faced enormous difficulties in doing so.

Things have gone wrong, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister—and she is a friend—will not take offence if I say that the Home Office and the other Departments involved did not cover themselves in glory in relation to events at Morecambe bay and the warnings given by my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith). We cannot blame an individual Minister for the failure of four Departments to co-ordinate their activities properly. If everybody in the House, on both sides and in all parties, had listened to what Joan Maynard and Dick Body said about gangmasters 20 years ago and had done something about it, those events would never have happened. We cannot blame my right hon. Friend for those failures, because she was not even a Member of Parliament at the time.

My right hon. Friend has an awful job, but it is done more efficiently than it has been in the past. I have been a Member of Parliament for 25 years and I know that she achieves a good turn-round on the innumerable letters that I send her. I do not know what else she can manage to do besides answering my letters, because her replies are always thorough and accurate. I believe that other Members write to her, too. She is in a terrible position; when she makes a decision she is denounced by some people as illiberal and by others as limp-wristed and weak, because she has let all sorts of "villainous" people into the country.

Now we have the Tory party jumping on the bandwagon with a leak from Sheffield. In an excellent speech, the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), asked whether the Sheffield civil servant had broken a code of conduct. He may have broken such a code if it turns out that he has pulled a political stunt with the Leader of the Opposition. It is against the civil service code of conduct for a civil servant to appear at a political stunt with the Prime Minister, so it would probably also be the case if he did so with the Leader of the Opposition.

The Tories are trying to link that to the advice that work permit applicants from the immediate accession countries should be "waved through", because it is so close to when they will be entitled to enter the country anyway. I have news for the Tory party: there is nothing new in that. The Tory party may have no corporate memory, but as the Leader of the Opposition was involved, he should be able to remember that the Home Office acted in the same way in 1995 when Austria,

Sweden and Finland were about to join the EU. As we were never told, we do not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman was unwilling, in the words of the motion, "to take responsibility" for the policy, or whether there were "dishonest internal workings" in his Department. He certainly kept quiet about it. Of course, he could say that he was following another Tory precedent, because exactly the same thing happened when Spain and Portugal were accession countries in 1986. As the period of accession drew nearer, the easier it was to enter this country, and eventually work permit applicants were "waved through", but that policy was not disclosed.

As has been mentioned, in 1992–93, when the Leader of the Opposition was Home Secretary, 20,000 people whose applications would otherwise have been turned down were given exceptional leave to remain, yet nothing was said about that. We found out that it had all been done secretly only when the figures were published some years later and had to be explained.

Of course, there are well organised scams. Indeed, I turn from scams to scum, because the people who organise the trafficking of their fellow human beings are among the scummiest people in the world. It appears that some of them are involved in what is going on in Rumania and Bulgaria and we need to check that and sort it out—and it will be sorted out.

There is a wider point, however. We are talking about people who are applying for work permits. They will receive a work permit only if we do not have people qualified for the work for which they require the permit. Work permits are going to people in the construction industry, to electricians and plumbers. Why do we not have enough of those workers? It is because the stupid Tory Government, under Mrs. Thatcher, abolished apprenticeships and sold off the training centres that could have trained the skilled people whom we now lack.

The Tories did not train enough doctors. They cut back on the training of nurses and reduced the number of nurses in training. Despite all that, they had planned to hold a debate later today—until they suddenly, opportunistically, chose to change the topic—about Labour's failure to prepare for doctors' reduced hours. The Tories reduced doctors' hours, but they did not increase the number of doctors to compensate for that. That is how we got into a mess, and the Labour Government are trying to get out of it.

When Nigel Lawson was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he mocked our calls for more and better training. He said that the jobs of the future would not necessarily be high-skill or low-skill, but that they would be no-skill jobs. As a result, we have a lot of people with no skills and they are the ones who find it hardest to get a job.

Today, we see the complete hypocrisy of the Tory party. The Tories left the immigration service in chaos and the Government are improving it. As for blaming officials, we shall take no lessons from the Leader of the Opposition; blaming officials was his stock in trade. The House will remember the famous interview when he said that he was responsible for prisons policy but not for operations. Paxman asked him again and again and again whether he took responsibility for operations in the Prison Service and he denied it. That is another reason why we shall not tolerate this lousy, opportunist, second-rate, smeary effort from the Tories today. [HON. MEMBERS: "Say what you mean."] One of these days, I shall say what I really think about them.

I want to say something very serious: if this sort of stirring up against people goes on, Islamophobia will grow. Our fellow citizens will be assaulted because they wear a scarf around their head. They will be spat at as they take their children to school and they will find life more and more difficult—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman must respect the time conventions as well as everyone else.

2.36 pm

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): I look forward to the day when we hear the frank and unvarnished opinions of the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson).

Control over borders should be a high priority for Members, in today's world more than ever. Many of our constituents say that there can be fewer high priorities and they expect us to hold the Government to account for the security of our borders and the soundness of the immigration system.

When something goes wrong, as it has plainly done on several occasions, we need to find out how bad the breakdown of the system is, the extent of what has gone wrong, how long it has been going on and the number of cases affected. Notwithstanding the remarks made from the Treasury Bench earlier, it is clear that something went wrong in the Sheffield department of the Home Office. Indeed, I thought that had been accepted on both sides of the House, but as I listened carefully to the Home Secretary earlier he seemed to be rowing back. He seemed to be trying to suggest that all the allegations made by Mr. Moxon had been disproved and that the Sutton report, to which I shall return in a moment, had completely exonerated the Government.

On Mr. Moxon, there seems to be an attempt in certain quarters to play the man rather than the ball—something with which we are all far too familiar. Whatever else may be the case about Mr. Moxon, his allegations turned out to be right. The Minister admitted that to the House and said that the procedures that had been followed would be withdrawn, so we do not need to go over that ground today. However, I remind the House that the Government's case then was not that everything was above board and that everything was going right; they said that something had gone wrong but that it was an isolated matter involving local guidance. On 8 March, the Minister told us that she knew nothing about what had gone wrong at the Sheffield office.

Today, we have heard new allegations that put a rather different complexion on the information that the right hon. Lady gave the House on 8 March and the Select Committee on Home Affairs the next day. They also overtake the Sutton report, which she set up—an internal inquiry by a senior civil servant from her own Department, albeit from a different part of the Department, but still an internal inquiry. The matters that have come up over the last day or so clearly overtake the Sutton report, whose remit restricted

[Mr. James Clappison]

Mr. Sutton to looking into a particular range of issues in the Sheffield office. In the final report, which I have read, Mr. Sutton emphasised, above all, that the context for his inquiry was a limited proportion of the casework of the immigration and nationality directorate. That was what he put first and foremost.

The suggestion that the Home Secretary has confirmed in large measure today is that, in fact, the issues run much wider than those considered by Mr. Sutton and that there was far more irregularity than just that which he considered, covering far more issues. As Mr. Cameron apparently put in his e-mail—one could not do better than this—what was revealed at the Sheffield office earlier this month was just the "tip of the iceberg", and we now need to look at how much of the iceberg remains beneath the surface. Not only is the Sutton report completely overtaken by what has emerged subsequently, but the new matters, which are partly admitted at least, put a completely different complexion on what the right hon. Lady told the House and the Home Affairs Committee earlier this month.

The right hon. Lady told the House that the relaxed procedures employed by the Sheffield office, about which Mr. Moxon complained, related to people who were already legally in the country and who were seeking to extend their stay. In her statement to the House, she emphasised:

"It is worth remembering that, principally, the people affected were already lawfully in this country."—[Official Report, 8 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1245.]

Yet in the new allegation, backed by documents, the case is clearly made that relaxed procedures were employed for such people, at least in Romania and Bulgaria, when they sought to enter the country in the first place.

According to Mr. Cameron—the man behind the report—the procedure involved thousands of applications from those seeking to enter or settle in Britain as students, spouses, au pairs, domestic servants, working holiday makers and dependant relatives of migrants already here. If that is right—it seems to have been admitted that it is right—I am afraid that it does not tally at all with the impression, given by the Minister on 8 March, that those involved were already in the country.

The Minister needs to tell us just what the state of her knowledge was about the allegations made by Mr. Cameron at the material time. If what Mr. Cameron is saying is right, the defences were down at every stage of the immigration control proceedings. They were down when the applicants applied to enter, and they were down again when people already in the country applied to the Sheffield office to stay.

How the fraud was dealt with is even more serious. Again, what has transpired puts a completely different complexion on what the right hon. Lady told the House. When she spoke in the House on 8 March, she was at pains to dismiss the question of fraud altogether. I remind her of her words:

"There was no question of staff being instructed to grant such leave to those whom they believed to be fraudulent."—[Official Report, 8 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1245.]

Breaking away from what she said, we know from what Mr Cameron said that fraud was very much an issue. I have only seen reports of the e-mail sent from the British embassy in Romania, but it would seem that fraud was very much an alarming issue in the case of both Romania and Bulgaria. According the reports that I have seen, the e-mail says:

"both countries were until March 1 overwhelmed with badly prepared bogus applications. When entry clearance officers write to Sheffield and state clearly that the application is being supported with forged and counterfeit documents the letters are ignored and the applications are still being issued".

We have heard more details about that, the involvement of the National Criminal Intelligence Service, and the extent of bogus applications and irregularities among the legal profession.

I shall ask the Minister some questions that she has to answer today. Was she aware of the allegations being made by Mr. Cameron when she made statement to the House on 8 March? Was she aware of what he said then? If so, how can she possibly justify the way in which she dismissed the question of fraud out of hand, as she did not only on 8 March on the Floor of the House, but in her evidence to the Home Affairs Committee?

I turn now to the memo that we have heard about in a separate allegation. The right hon. Lady told the Home Affairs Committee on 9 March—the day after the statement—that the backlog had arisen as a result of matters that took place in the previous autumn. She referred to the BRACE procedure, but she said that it was a longstanding approach to backlogs that simply allowed caseworkers to use discretion if all the papers in certain cases, possibly marriage cases, were not there.

The memo, which has apparently come from two senior civil servants in the Minister's Department, clearly refers to an enhanced BRACE policy that was implemented in July 2003, with, it is said, the specific approval of the Minister. If so, it puts an entirely different complexion on what she told the Home Affairs Committee, when she said that the policy was not implemented until later last year and that it arose because of backlogs. Was she aware of that memo? Was the memo true? Was the policy implemented with her agreement in 2003—not in response to an individual case, as she told the House in response to the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), but on a much more widespread basis than she admitted to the hon. Gentleman?

The memo of July 2003 says:

"As there are a large number of applications that are over three months old waiting to be decided, it has been agreed at ministerial level that an enhanced procedure should be undertaken to clear these as quickly as possible.

This note confirms that the decision in this case has been taken under an enhanced procedure for clearing backlog cases, which commenced on 14 July, 2003."

Why did the Minister not refer to that memo when she appeared before the Home Affairs Committee? She had something to say about BRACE and the backlog procedures. Does the memo not put an entirely different complexion on the evidence about the Sheffield problems that she gave to the Home Affairs Committee?

Mr. Watson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because time is limited.

The Minister said that the Sheffield matters were all locally determined by staff and had arisen as a result of local problems with a backlog later in the year, but the policy was decided centrally and agreed by Ministers. The right hon. Lady should deal with the question of what she knew about the BRACE procedure and the enhanced procedure in 2003. She should also deal with what she knew about Mr. Cameron and his allegation that the iceberg would have remained completely unknown if it had not been for my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench. They deserve congratulations for bringing this matter to light. They have done a public service, and I commend them on the way in which they have brought the issue to the attention of the House. They are right to do so.

Mr. Watson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: No.

The Minister now has to face up to her responsibilities. She has been asked many times what responsibility she takes in all this. How does she square her responsibilities with what she has said in the past? What does she accept responsibility for today, given the mess, with all the immigration system's defences down, as described in the memo at the Sheffield office? It is no use the right hon. Lady shaking her head; we want answers. What responsibility does she accept?

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this debate because it touches on one of the issues of greatest concern to my constituents—matters relating to asylum and immigration—and it is precisely for that reason that I believe that the Conservative party has raised it particularly at this time. When an election is coming, the Conservative party talks about immigration. Muddling up debates about eastern Europe and the EU also plays well.

Mr. Cameron: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Keeble: No, I will not give way because time is limited.

I am particularly pleased to support the work that my right hon. Friend the Minister has done in pushing forward improvements to the asylum system. An awful lot of what is needed in her job is exceptionally unglamorous and does not involve big policy decisions; most of it relates to putting in the proper procedures, seeing them through and getting the systems working. She has done that extraordinarily well, and certainly the recent moves that she has made have produced real benefits for my constituents.

Shortly after I was elected, I went to look at some of the asylum procedures that were in place in my constituency. A number of people were arriving there, but we inherited the system from the Conservatives, and it was the most ramshackle, non-system that I had ever seen. There was a completely farcical approach to the payment of benefits, there was no networking between the different agencies, and the Conservatives' idea of new technology was a pencil sharpener. There was no proper system for identifying the people who were claiming asylum and receiving benefits. For a party that talks tough about identity cards, it was astonishing to see the total failure to identify properly the people who were coming in and out, claiming benefits and moving around the system. There was also a complete denial of the fact that many people were coming into the country and claiming asylum. If there were not scams then, that was partly because one did not need to run an effective scam to work through what was a totally shambolic system.

The Labour Government have increasingly put steps in place that have improved the system, and my right hon. Friend the Minister has pushed them through. For example, a new system was put in place for asylum support. Certainly, it faced problems, but it was a distinct improvement on the shambles that we inherited from the Conservative party. A range of different identification documents and cards are in place and they will establish who people and their dependants are. Those documents can be relied on and they replace the lack of documentation in the previous system. There has been an increase in the number of decisions taken, and they have repeatedly been reported to Parliament.

There has also been an increase in the number of removals. Any Member who visits their police station can ask the police officers there about the number of removals that they have to deal with. There has certainly been in an increase in the number of removals going through Northampton. There has also been open discussion about managed migration, which relates to the points that my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) made about ensuring that we have the people to do the jobs that others simply do not want to do.

In my constituency, there has been, particularly recently, an increase in the number of enforcement actions taken. For example, a successful raid took place today on a factory that employed illegal migrants. Fifty-seven people were stopped and, so far, 33 of them have been arrested and will be removed. I very much welcome the increase in such actions.

It is certainly true that there is further to go. The Conservative party has highlighted a scam, but it is not the only scam that has ever existed. There should be proper recognition that circumstances have changed over the past couple of years and that an increasingly and extremely sophisticated international industry is engaged in trafficking and the forging and sale of documents. That has made it extremely hard to tackle some of the problems that we confront.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister shares my concerns about the proliferation of forged documents, and I know that she and her Department are also working to tackle the problem. An examination of the forged documents in the possession of the immigration and nationality directorate at Croydon and at Heathrow make it clear that they are produced to an extremely high standard and put through a sophisticated market. However, there is an increasing problem of documents being obtained through apparently legal means and then being used by different people. There are increasing problems of impersonation, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will put more resources into dealing with the appalling problem of forgeries that are part of a huge international trade. The people detained today in my constituency were found to be travelling on false documents.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that all these issues are real and that this Government have tackled them by putting in more resources and getting the organisation right? The last thing we need is any future Government threatening cuts in those resources. That would make it impossible in future to tackle the problems created by new technologies.

Ms Keeble: My hon. Friend is right. I was just about to come to that point.

The Conservative party has been extremely good at talking the talk in the way it did before 1997. It absolutely refused to put in place the steps and procedures that were needed to deal with the problem. Just as it did not have proper procedures for dealing with benefits, it did not have the proper documentation available to check on who people were, or the proper new technology in place to enable the different agencies to network properly. It also refused to support openly the proposals that my right hon. Friend the Minister and colleagues introduced to improve and speed up the legal procedures, so that we could deal with claims, in particular false claims, more quickly. Rather than just talking about the problems, we need to ensure that there is proper support in place for the solutions that the Government are putting forward.

My right hon. Friend is tightening up on the procedures to prevent abuse of the legal system, but there is also a need for the Law Society to deal with some of the problems created when certain lawyers handle such cases. It is noticeable that the case in Bucharest involved lawyers who were taking substantial sums of money for processing many claims that they must have known were false.

I very much welcome the steps that have been taken so far. My right hon. Friend has done more than any other Minister who has held her position to tighten up the procedures, to take difficult decisions and to see them through. I hope that she will continue to do that in exactly the way she has done previously. The public must also realise that, if the problems of asylum and immigration are to be dealt with properly, it will take tough decisions and proper resourcing. Cuts of the type proposed by the Conservative party will not suffice, and impractical proposals such as parking people on offshore islands, are complete nonsense. It is only by clamping down on the procedures while dealing with the issues of properly managed migration that my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras mentioned that we can allay people's fears and make for a civilised society that has decent race relations and sound systems.

2.58 pm

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): We have learned three important things in the debate so far, the first of which is that Ministers seem very reticent about wanting to get to the facts.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cameron: I have only just started my speech, but I will be delighted to give way to the hon. Lady.

Lady Hermon: I am enormously grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene so early in his speech. For clarification and my peace of mind, will he justify the shadow Home Secretary's use of the word "collusion"? I should like to learn four things from the debate, one of which is the justification for the use of that word by the shadow Home Secretary.

Mr. Cameron: Much of my speech will be about the Minister's role, so I shall try to answer the hon. Lady's question during it.

We have learned three important things. First, Ministers seem reluctant to get to the facts. The Home Secretary told us that Mr. Cameron—no relation, I stress—the official in our Bucharest embassy, met Home Office officials on 1 March. We need to know who was told about his concerns. Why were they not examined by the Sutton inquiry? We need to see the minutes of the meeting between Mr. Cameron and the Home Office official so that we can find out who knew what and when. If Ministers wanted to get to the facts, the Sutton inquiry would have covered that straight away.

Secondly, Ministers seem reluctant to take responsibility. The Home Secretary said on the radio this morning that Ken Sutton will now widen his inquiry, go to Bucharest and examine the matter further, which is important. He also said, as he repeated in the House, that no Minister would resign—there will be no scalps. What will happen if Ken Sutton finds that Ministers were responsible in some way and that they knew something but did nothing about it? The Home Secretary has effectively prejudged his own inquiry.

We learned a third important fact from my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis): that our embassies in Sofia and Bucharest had written to the Home Office raising important concerns. The most important question that the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration must answer is whether Ministers saw those letters. If they did but did not act, they are to blame for much of what has gone wrong. If they did not see the letters, does that not prove that we need a wider inquiry, worthy though the Sutton inquiry is? I am sure that Ken Sutton is a great man, but we need a proper independent inquiry.

I wanted to speak in the debate because immigration and asylum are of long-standing interest to me. I am not some Johnny-come-lately to the subject, although Labour Members say that we are interested in the matter only because of the politics. I worked in the Home Office, I have served on Committees that have considered asylum and immigration Bills and I am a member of the Select Committee on Home Affairs. I have asked the Minister questions about the Moxon affair in that Committee and the Chamber, but I have not been satisfied by the answers that I have received. I do not believe in pursuing Ministers for the sake of it. We did that with the former Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions; he has gone and what benefit was that? We must try to get to the truth.

I agree that the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration has what I once described in The Guardian as the "job from hell" in having to deal with all inquiries. I do not pretend that a Minister with thousands of civil servants can be held responsible for every last thing that they do. However, I have seen events unfold from relatively close at hand, so I know that the way in which the Government have handled the matter has not been impressive in any sense.

Let us be absolutely clear about what has happened throughout the saga. First, the policy on entry clearance for one group of people was being operated by officials without ministerial knowledge. That is clearly evidence of a failing Department—we have heard further evidence from my Front-Bench colleagues about its failure today. The Minister herself said about the Sutton report:

"This report makes clear that the current system of management and lines of accountability in parts of IND are not good enough"— as I said, we have a failing Department.

Next, we find out that the whistleblower—Mr. Moxon—told the Minister's private office that the policy has been introduced, but he received no response for more than two months, which is evidence of a failing private office. As she told the Home Affairs Committee:

"That was a failing in my office, there is absolutely no doubt about that".

We know from the Minister's mouth that as well as a failing Department, we have a failing private office.

The whistleblower then went to the press. The Sunday Times called the Minister's press office and the Home Office made several denials. Its final denial said:

"There have been no changes in procedures or dip in the level of scrutiny applied by case workers."

That was simply not true, because as the Minister admitted at the Dispatch Box on 8 March:

"The response from the Home Office to the press reports on Friday ... was wrong."—[Official Report, 8 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1247.]

As well as a failing Department and private office, we have a failing press office that actively misleads the press. In the same statement on 8 March, the Minister said that the lapse in scrutiny was "rare and untypical"—those words are important.

Next, the Prime Minister backed up the Minister during Prime Minister's Question Time by saying:

"the issue is simple: a practice developed in"

the Home Office

"that should not have developed ... I am trying to put the matter in context because it is not the case that it involves hundreds of thousands of people a year. It almost certainly involves only a very small number of people"—[Official Report, 10 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1516.]

He repeated the line that the problem was a rare and untypical one in the Home Office. However, we know that it was not rare and untypical and that the accelerated procedures were applied to other groups. As the leaked memo in The Sunday Times said:

"all applications as far as possible over 3 months old should be granted ... This exercise has been agreed by the Minister of State, Beverley Hughes."

No one can doubt that the matter is serious.

From what I have seen, a clear picture emerges of complacency among Ministers, of them not wanting to get to the facts and of them having the truth pulled out of them slowly, bit by bit. Let me give two examples of that.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cameron: I have given way to the hon. Lady once; I am trying to answer her question at length.

First, in the Minister's response to the urgent question on 8 March, did she tell the House that accelerated procedures were being applied to other groups of applicants for residency in this country? No, she did not. Did she answer questions about that matter from my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden and others? No, she did not. Did she deliberately give the impression that the situation was rare and untypical? Yes, she did. If the Minister had come to the House to apologise for what had happened, announce a proper inquiry and talk frankly about the problems of dealing with backlogs, the Home Office would not be in the mess that it is in now. The way in which she made her statement on 8 March was a genuine misjudgment.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman talks about misjudgment and backlogs. Was it a misjudgment in 1992 and 1993 when the backlogs were wiped out by the Conservative party?

Mr. Cameron: If we were to have a proper debate, we could talk about a time when we had a Home Secretary who actually cut crime and had a decent asylum and immigration policy with fewer applications than at present, but that is not what we are discussing today.

The scope of the inquiry that the Minister set up shows a second profound misjudgment. Part of her Department is failing, and her private office and press office have been shown to fail. There are huge question marks over the extent to which the accelerated procedures for migrants have been applied. We know that much more widespread concern exists, including that expressed by our embassies in Bucharest and Sofia. However, what was to be covered by Ken Sutton's inquiry? Would it cover her private office? No. Would it cover the press office that deliberately misled the press? No. Would it examine initially how far the accelerated procedures for granting immigration went? That was not the case to start with because there had to be a second announcement about the inquiry on 12 March. A third extension of the Sutton inquiry was announced on the radio this morning by the Home Secretary when he said that Ken Sutton is going out to Bucharest. The situation is utterly unconvincing. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden and the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) said, we need a proper independent inquiry. The Minister has made a profound misjudgment.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cameron: I will not give way again. We have seen a picture of complacency and unwillingness to get to the facts. The truth had to be dragged out of the Minister time after time. The hon. Member for Winchester was rather generous to the Minister—

Mr. Clappison: And polite.

Mr. Cameron: He was polite as well. The Minister has lost the confidence of many of her officials because she has blamed them for what went wrong. She has certainly lost the confidence of much of the press because her press office has completely misled it. She has lost the confidence of many MPs because she simply has not given us full answers.

The question for the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister is: if one has a Department and a private office that have failed, and if there is more and more evidence of chaos in the system and clear evidence that a wider inquiry is needed, is the Minister of State the right person to turn matters around? I find it hard to believe that the answer to that question is yes.

3.8 pm

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): I am sure that I am not the only person in the Chamber to remember the episode of "Yes Minister" in which Sir Humphrey remarked that almost all Government policy was bad, but frightfully well carried out. I do not think that that is the case in this instance. Today we must ask with whom responsibility lies when a policy is right, but not carried out properly.

Let us not mistake the broad consensus—I think that there is probably some consensus on both sides of the House—that the basic policy is right. I hope that there is some agreement that this country needs hard-working migrants to boost our economy and enrich our society. When my parents came here in the 1960s, they were part of a generation of immigrants who helped to build up our public services. Likewise, prospective immigrants today, if they have qualifications, skills and a willingness to work, should be welcomed—and, yes, even fast-tracked.

Today's dispute is about the implementation of such a policy and the ways in which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration should be held responsible for errors in that implementation. Unfortunately, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) advanced an argument the conclusions of which bear no relation to its premises. The Opposition cite the principle of ministerial responsibility, by which they mean the Minister taking responsibility for officials' actions that contradict the very policy set out by the Minister. Not only do the Opposition blame my right hon. Friend personally, but they claim that the only way in which she can exercise responsibility for it is by resigning. That is simply not the case.

Ministers are answerable to Parliament for the actions of their officials. They can be and are held accountable through questioning and public debate, as has happened in the present case. Ministers might have to explain in the House what has been done by an official, and that, too, has happened in this case. That is the convention, that is what my right hon. Friend has done in the House, and that is what has been examined in some detail by Ken Sutton. None the less, the Opposition allege that responsibility must, at all times and in all places, equal a resignation. No offence is considered too far removed from a Minister's private office. The claiming of a ministerial scalp seems to be the most important—indeed, the only—thing that the Opposition are willing to accept.

The Tories' rationale for demanding that my right hon. Friend leave office was unwittingly revealed by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) last night on "Newsnight". He told Kirsty Wark:

"It is difficult for this government to accuse us"— that is, the Tories—"of popularity." I would not dream of accusing them of such a thing. However, in the present case, they are guilty of ham-fisted and unprincipled opportunism.

Mr. Cameron: If this is all about opportunism, why has the Home Secretary today announced that no further immigration applications will be accepted from Romania?

Mr. Dhanda: I was coming to those points. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is absolutely right to have a further investigation. He says that if there are issues to be investigated, let us investigate them, and he is right to do so.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to intervene?

Mr. Dhanda: Let me make a little more progress, then I shall be happy to give way.

In my view, when the shadow Home Secretary received the e-mail in question, he should have reported it to the Home Office straight away. Instead, he decided to wait three weeks. The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire tried to explain the inordinate delay by claiming:

"We needed to check out the email before handing it over. We needed to check if the allegations were accurate."

That has been repeated today in the Chamber. However, checking the accuracy of the allegations was the whole point of the inquiry, so the e-mail should have been forwarded three weeks ago.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is misattributing remarks. The point that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and I have made, time and again, is that we needed the time not to check the accuracy of the statement—we were in no position to do so—but to check the e-mail's provenance. All we knew was that we had an anonymous e-mail; we had to find out its provenance and determine whether its author had some justification for making the allegations set out within it. That is totally separate from authenticating its contents.

Mr. Dhanda: I believe that if the hon. Gentleman found evidence of a burglary or a murder, he would not act as judge and jury himself, but would report that evidence to the authorities immediately. The Opposition chose not to do that in the present case, and although the hon. Gentleman has given his reasons for acting as he did. I disagree with them. The Opposition stood back and calculated the political gain that they believed they would score from delaying for some weeks. They put the e-mail in the public domain only yesterday, repeated its allegations today, then—feigning indignation—they called for the resignation of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Paice: The hon. Gentleman appears to be in conflict with the Home Secretary, who this morning accepted that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden was right to wait while the provenance of the e-mail was checked. Of course, we had no knowledge as to its authenticity until the Foreign Office interviewed Mr. Cameron and suspended him, and he then telephoned my right hon. Friend's office. That was the first time that we were certain that the author of the e-mail was anyone who knew what they were talking about.

Mr. Dhanda: As I said, the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues could have sent the e-mail to Ken Sutton for investigation had they chosen to. They chose not to do that, and that is a matter of record.

A resignation in these circumstances not only lacks a basis in constitutional principle—

Mr. Garnier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Dhanda: No, I have given way enough.

A resignation would also fail to serve any practical purpose. We are well aware of the developments in the Home Office and of how much my right hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration has managed to achieve. Margot Asquith once memorably said of Lloyd George

"He cannot see a belt without hitting below it."

Neither can the Opposition—nor can they see a bandwagon without jumping on it, or a principle without abandoning it.

I know that a great deal of work needs to be done in the Balkan states. On Saturday, in Split, I met representatives of south-east European countries. I believe that they would be the first to accept that much work is necessary before their countries can become accession states. However, I share the concern expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that debates such as this one can have a detrimental effect on immigrant communities resident in this country. I hope that the debate and the way in which the Conservatives have decided to handle these issues will not have a negative impact.

Mr. Garnier: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not under the misapprehension that the debate is about Beverley Hughes. This debate is about the Minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman will use the correct parliamentary language.

Mr. Garnier: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, there is no "with respect". The hon. and learned Gentleman must use the correct parliamentary language.

Mr. Garnier: Let me rephrase my intervention. This debate is not about the individual woman who happens to be the right hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes). It is about the office holder who happens to be the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration at the Home Office. It deals with a precise and discrete constitutional question about where ministerial responsibility lies. It is not a personal attack on the individual Minister—[Interruption.] Will the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) accept that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions can only be so long.

Mr. Dhanda: The hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) tries to make a point in his own way, but I do not think that he has taken the House with him.

The shadow Home Secretary said that he feels that the Conservatives had their immigration and asylum strategy right. I say that a strategy that in April 1997 had people waiting up to 20 months for a decision was not the right and proper strategy. The current incumbent in the post of Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, my right hon. Friend the Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes), has presided over a Home Office department that has ensured that the people in two thirds of cases now wait for less than six months. She is doing a terrific job and everyone in the House should get behind her.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): The debate raises two issues. The first is the pattern of behaviour of Ministers, which began with denial, followed by grudging acceptance when finally they were faced with documentary evidence of what they had previously denied. That was then followed by denigration and suspension of the whistleblowers. They moved on to protestations of ignorance of what was happening in their Departments, and in the end they blamed officials. Above all, and most wrong of all, Ministers refused to accept responsibility for the actions and inactions of their Department. In my view, to blame officials is despicable, to claim ignorance is culpable and to deny responsibility is intolerable.

It is not only the Minister of State. The Home Secretary behaved with apparent chivalry by clasping the right hon. Lady to his bosom but, in fact, he was using her as a human shield. He must ask himself who is ultimately responsible in the Home Office for policy and who will take responsibility. The position of the Home Secretary must itself be under question. I suspect that the Prime Minister will move the right hon. Gentleman from his present post before too long. Anyway, there must be an independent inquiry into what has happened under his stewardship of the Government's policies.

Far more important than that is the policy that is being pursued by the Home Office. Most people imagine that its policy on immigration is to restrict immigration to what is necessary for family reunions, for meeting shortages that cannot be met until we have trained indigenous people to meet the requirements of particular jobs, and for bringing in people with company-specific knowledge necessary for the functioning of their companies, for example.

[Mr. Peter Lilley]

We learn, however, that there has been a transposal of policy. The basic thrust of what is happening in the Home Office is to facilitate and encourage immigration to this country. I say that advisedly, and not only because of the devastating revelations about particular eastern European countries that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) set out. The Department has set a target to boost the number of people asking for work permits to come into this country: from a figure of about 47,000 in 1997, it has set a target of 200,000 in the current year.

I asked the Minister, on the day after she made her statement, a series of questions. I asked what the targets were within the Department. Characteristically the right hon. Lady has not answered. Is that because she does not know the answers to the questions that I tabled for answer within five days or is she withholding them until after this debate, as has been done so many times before?

Lady Hermon: Forgive me for being boringly repetitive, but will the right hon. Gentleman explain and justify the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) using very serious language and suggesting that there was collusion? Where is there one item of evidence that there has been collusion?

Mr. Lilley: I did not catch that particular word, but I take it that my right hon. Friend was referring to collusion with the accelerated procedures, which seem to have been responsible for the bulk of cases. It is claimed that only a small tweak was introduced. The Minister of State said that it was not introduced by senior managers, but Ken Sutton said that it was introduced by senior managers.

It is not only that a target has been set to increase the number of work permits; people are being actively encouraged to apply for work permits. I have a letter that was sent out by the Home Office Work Permits (UK) to small businesses in this country, which reads:

"Dear Sir or Madam: Are you struggling to find the quality of staff you need to run your business effectively? Do you want to employ an individual from outside Europe but are not sure how?"

The unit says that it can get help from the Department in bringing in high, medium and low-skilled people to fill vacancies. It continues:

"Work Permits (UK) is a department of the Home Office and is based in Sheffield. We have set up a Small Business Unit with the specific aim of raising awareness of the work permit arrangements amongst small and medium sized businesses . . . "

Mr. McCabe: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lilley: No. I am not going to give up more time.

The Government are actively encouraging people to bring other people into this country. They have reduced the rate of refusals from more than one in eight under the Conservative Government to fewer than one in 20 of those who apply to come here. We have seen how they are colluding in the exploitation of loopholes. The particular loophole that was the origin of all this was the requirement under the accession treaties to allow people to come from the accession countries to the UK to establish businesses. That was not meant to allow people to come to this country as office cleaners and describe that as setting up a business.

In his report, Mr. Sutton says:

"A typical case would be a Romanian student coming to the end of their course in this country and planning to set up in business as a cleaner."

Should we be allowing thousands of people—possibly tens of thousands—to do that? The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) seems to think that that is amusing, but most people do not believe that that is the purpose of the immigration service.

The reason why we have such backlogs that constantly have to be dealt with by accelerated procedures is that there is a growing number of applications—about 500,000 according to the Sutton report. The reason why there are so many applications is that the Government have made it easy and speedy to get into the country, unlike the position in most other countries. Consequently, more people apply and they overwhelm the system.

It has become clear, too, that the default position in the Department is to let people in rather than to deny them entry: if they do not provide sufficient information, let them in. The document says, "If they don't supply a bank statement, let them in. If they don't have other information about their national insurance and so on, let them in." Surely if people cannot or do not provide the information that is requested of them, they should be refused entry. That should be the default position.

My constituents, by and large, want a restrictive immigration policy, and that includes people of all ethnic groups there. I have had representations from ethnic minorities in my constituency to the effect that they would prefer a stricter and firmer immigration policy. The reason my constituents want that is certainly not because they hold racist views. They accept it when I say that the bulk of the people who want to come to this country, be they asylum seekers, economic migrants or even illegal immigrants, are basically decent people who want to better the lot of themselves and their families. But they know, as we surely all know, that this country is too crowded to be a country of net immigration.

Apart from the Netherlands, England is the most densely populated country in western Europe, yet for the first time in our history we have one of the highest rates of net immigration and it is being deliberately encouraged by the Government. We see the consequences in our constituencies. The bulk of the people who come to this country come to London and the south-east. Accommodation has to be provided for them. The Government admitted in response to a question that I tabled that 85 per cent. of the growth in population that they expect over the next 30 years—5.6 million extra people—is the result of net immigration. That is one of the major reasons that there is pressure on housing accommodation and public services in the south-east.

Unless and until the Government and the Ministers concerned are prepared to make the immigration service do what it ought to do—restrict immigration to those who need to come to this country, not encourage it on a large scale—there will not be the public confidence in the Home Office that there ought to be.

3.29 pm

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): The Minister and I have had many dealings together in Committee and across the Floor of the House. Throughout my dealings with her, I have found her courteous, kind, helpful and efficient and I make no challenge whatever to her personal integrity. But today she and the Home Office face two central charges. The first is that Ministers have presided over an increasingly chaotic and shambolic asylum and immigration system that, after more than seven years of the Government, is universally condemned throughout the country for its inefficiency. The first charge is massive incompetence.

The second charge is more serous and it is this: in order to persuade the general public that all is well when plainly it is not, Home Office and Foreign Office officials are encouraged, if not ordered, by someone somewhere to manipulate the system, to operate it improperly and to behave improperly, in an attempt, first, to please their political masters and reach the targets they have been set, and secondly, to persuade the general public that everything is under control, when plainly it is not.

Kali Mountford: What does the hon. Gentleman say to the charge put to his party by my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that exactly the same procedures were adopted for the new accession countries under the Government that the hon. Gentleman supported?

Mr. Malins: No, not in the same way. I shall come to that in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Garnier: May I add another reason to my hon. Friend's two? Is there not a fundamental constitutional issue? Under our eccentric constitutional arrangements, we have the Executive sitting in Parliament. Unless they are prepared to be accountable to Parliament, they are not performing their proper constitutional function. Irrespective of the personality involved—I was ticked off a moment ago for using a personal name—unless Ministers are prepared to accept responsibility for their role as Ministers, rather than passing the buck down the line to civil servants, the system breaks down. That may not be important to some, but to me, and I hope to my hon. Friend, it is.

Mr. Malins: My hon. and learned Friend is right. It is nothing to do with personalities. It is to do with the office of Minister. Responsibility must be lodged somewhere. It is not right for Ministers continually to blame junior officials when, in truth, the buck stops with the Minister. My second allegation relates to the integrity of the system, which I believe is now at stake.

I shall deal briefly with the first allegation—incompetence. In the Government's first year of office, the bilateral treaty that we had with France whereby people arriving unlawfully on our shores were returned to France lapsed and the Government were never able to renegotiate it. That was their first failure. Partly in consequence, the number of asylum seekers began to rise dramatically. By 2002, we had become the asylum capital of Europe, with well over 100,000 asylum applications in that year, the largest total ever.

The Government could not cope properly. That important area of initial decision making was hopelessly neglected—and is still neglected, according to the Labour-dominated Home Affairs Committee. Life and death decisions are made by officials who receive a mere 27 days' training and a salary of only a little more than £15,000 a year. Proof that the quality of initial decisions under Labour is going down can be found in the statistics. In 2002, 22 per cent. of appeals against their decisions were successful, whereas in the last year of the Conservative Government, that figure was only 4 per cent. Members in all parts of the House—Members of the Minister's own party—have roundly condemned the Government for failing to put sufficient resources and expertise into initial decisions.

Mr. Watson: As a former member of the Home Affairs Committee, I remember the dignity with which the hon. Gentleman took evidence. Does he recall taking evidence about the computer system and, more importantly, about the 1,200 redundancies of experienced caseworkers that that situation created, which contributed significantly to the backlog?

Mr. Malins: We are sick and tired of Labour Members discussing so-called failures seven or eight years ago. The Labour Government have been in power for more than seven years, and they should take responsibility for their actions and for their failings.

I note that delays are still endemic in the system. More than 10,000 cases a year still take more than eight weeks to get an initial decision. The average time to get from the initial decision to the adjudicator is now some 17 weeks, or more than four months.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): It is a bit better than it was in 1997.

Mr. Malins: Again, a Labour Member mentions 1997. When will the Labour party begin to take responsibility for the past seven years, rather than continually looking back to the seven years before that?

Given that the conduct of the appeal is usually in the hands of the Home Office, a 17-week delay is far too long. Much to its shame, the Home Office is increasingly unrepresented by lawyers or its own presenting officers at hearings before the adjudicator, which causes further delay.

Life for the adjudicators has been made even more frustrating by the ability of appellants to include all their human rights claims in their appeal. As a result, thousands of applicants for asylum who fail under the convention are nevertheless permitted to stay and are granted exceptional leave to remain under the Human Rights Act 1998. It is a stark statistic that, in the last year of the Conservative Government, about 3,000 people were granted exceptional leave to remain in this country, whereas under this Government more than 20,000 people have been allowed exceptional leave to remain in each of the past two years.

What happens at the end of the day to the failed asylum seeker? In truth, the Government's removals policy has been an abject failure and is widely recognised as such up and down the country. They set themselves a target of 34,000 removals per year, but they have been unable to get anywhere near it and have had to abandon it. The system has been discredited, because four out of five failed asylum seekers know that they can remain in this country, notwithstanding the fact that they have no case whatsoever. One consequence of that discredited system is that the Home Secretary was obliged to grant, as he did last year, an amnesty to about 50,000 failed asylum seekers.

The Government say that legislation is the answer, but I remind them that the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 had virtually no effect on the system, and the flagship policy of placing asylum seekers in accommodation centres and induction centres has been a disaster. In the past two years, not one accommodation centre has been set up under this Government. They have talked a good case but failed to act.

The Government have no clear or effective policy on managed migration. When the Home Secretary was asked to estimate how many people are here illegally, he replied that he "has not got a clue".

On migration generally, he argues, quite wrongly, that there is no obvious upper limit on the number of migrants who could be present in this country.

The charge of incompetence is proved beyond reasonable doubt, but the second allegation about the integrity of the system is even more serious, and we must deal with it today.

Hugh Bayley: The hon. Gentleman prefaced his remarks by paying tribute to the Minister's competence and personal integrity. Is it just a coincidence that whenever the Conservative party guns for the scalp of a Minister, it happens to be a woman, as was the case with the former Secretary of State for Education and Skills, who is now Minister for the Arts, and with the Minister for Children, and now with this Minister? Was the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) right when she said that her party was a "nasty party" that would take such action on such grounds?

Mr. Malins: Frankly, that is such an absurd intervention that I will not dignify it with a response.

The story of Mr. Steve Moxon, which broke a few weeks ago, should have put the Government on notice that there were serious problems ahead. He is an immigration caseworker who revealed that officials had been ordered to fast-track thousands of applicants with few or no checks on their authenticity. Since November 2002, civil servants have been told to fast-track applications under the BRACE—backlog reduction accelerated clearance exercise—procedure. Rather sinisterly, the memorandum said:

"as this is not a published policy, no reference should be made to this, either to the applicant or his representatives or on the Home Office website."

That shows that a lot is going on behind the scenes with this Government that we do not know about, and that we should know about. When challenged about it, the Home Office said that there had been no changes in procedures or dips in the level of the scrutiny applied by caseworkers. Pull the other one: the truth is that there have been changes and dips in scrutiny. Unwisely, the Minister told the House of Commons that the case was "rare and untypical". She would have been much wiser at that stage to acknowledge the seriousness of the allegation and set up some form of independent inquiry right across the Home Office. She went on to tell the Select Committee on Home Affairs that it was absurd to imply that she should be made responsible for this.

The second major allegation relates to what took place on 28 March, with new leaked documents claiming that the Minister authorised the fast-tracking of applications. The memorandum from two senior officials at Croydon stated:

"All applications—as far as possible—over three months old should be granted, unless the information available on file is such that it can properly and defensibly support a refusal. Where a case will result in a refusal, the case must be cleared by a senior case worker. No further inquiries should be made."

Significantly, it adds:

"This exercise has been agreed by the minister of state, Beverley Hughes."

Thirdly, we heard from the diplomat in Romania about what he was instructed to do.

Mr. Gerrard: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Malins: No, I have no time: I must move on. I have given way on many occasions.

The third serious allegation comes from the British consul in Bucharest, who said:

"The Home Office judgment and decision making with regard to ECAA applications is a continual problem for overseas posts such as Sofia and Bucharest."

He goes on to say that there has been excessive pressure to grant applications that in effect have no merit whatsoever. The truth of the matter is that there are countless examples of cases that those people had to grant when they should never have done so. One example is that of Mr. C, who applied for a visa under the ECAA—European Community association agreement—scheme in August 2003. The visa assistant at the British embassy said:

"We telephoned his company and they told us they've never heard of him and he's never worked for them."

However, the Home Office lost the letter—surprise, surprise—which suggests that the claim was bogus, and Mr. C was granted a visa allowing him into Britain.

One example of bad practice would be one thing, and a second example might be thought to be coincidence, but in the past three months we have had three clear examples of a practice adopted across the Home Office that brings the integrity of the whole system into question. It is time that the Government considered a full and independent inquiry, probably by a High Court judge, into exactly what has been going on.

The Home Secretary acknowledges that the position is serious, but where does responsibility for it lie? Does he believe that it lies with junior officials? Does he think that it lies with middle-ranking officials? Or does he believe that it lies with senior officials? He would probably reply, yes, yes, yes. It may be slightly old-fashioned to say so, but Conservative Members believe that the responsibility lies with Ministers and that the buck stops there.

3.45 pm

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): First, I thank all my hon. Friends who have intervened and contributed to the debate for their support and speeches. I also thank the hon. Members for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) and for North Down (Lady Hermon), who were the only two people on the Opposition Benches to conduct any research or have well-informed views about the issues that we have discussed during the past few weeks.

Mr. Lilley: Will the Minister give way?

Beverley Hughes: I shall give way in a moment.

I genuinely regret the way in which Conservative Members have approached the issue. They have shown that they do not care about the substance of the matter. It is simply another bandwagon to jump on for their purposes.

Mr. Lilley: Will the Minister give way?

Beverley Hughes: I want to make some progress first. I shall inform the right hon. Gentleman when I am ready to give way.

I genuinely regret Conservative Members' approach because they know, as we do, that migration is important for this country. That has always been the case because we are an island nation. Immigration is important now and will increasingly be so as our population changes. Immigrants have helped us to create wealth, compete in world markets and build strong relationships with other countries. However, the Tories and their newspapers promote a barrage of scare stories, which demonise all immigrants—we heard an example of that today from the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley)—as scroungers, criminals or worse, claim that everything is out of control, undermine the staff who have achieved genuine reforms and stoke up fear and insecurity instead of encouraging the rational and open debate that we need. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and others who said that we need that debate to face up to some genuine issues and decisions.

Mr. Lilley: The Minister must have misheard. I said that all immigrants are hard working, industrious people who want to improve their lot and that of their families. Will she therefore withdraw her remarks? Earlier, she castigated Opposition Members for not conducting research. I tabled questions on the day of her previous statement. They asked, among other things, what targets she had set for processing claims. She has not replied. Is that because she does not know the answer or is she withholding the information until after the debate?

Beverley Hughes: The right hon. Gentleman might have said that migrants were hard working but he also said that he did not want any in the country, period.

Mr. Lilley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister, having once said something untrue about one, to go on to say something else untrue about one?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are considering very serious matters. I say to the Minister and the House that everybody involved in the debate should choose their words carefully.

Beverley Hughes: That is exactly right. The Conservatives do not like hearing about their record in Government, but it is important to recognise the absolute shambles in which they left the immigration department, with no proper systems or management and more than 1,000 caseworkers dismissed on the basis of a computer system that never arrived. I remind the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) that the Home Office was totally unprepared to respond to the Kosovan crisis—an enormous crisis that led to an influx of people here.

It has taken a systematic and radical reform, step by step—it is not complete yet—to put that right.

The Opposition have criticised us for not being able to say how many people are here. I remind them that the Conservative party in government removed embarkation controls, so we have no way of articulating that. The asylum system had in it, as we have heard, delay after delay, with cases going on for years and years. Secret decisions were taken quietly to grant asylum seekers leave to remain, of which we became aware only later when the figures were published, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) pointed out.

Mr. Cameron: We have heard from the Home Secretary that our consul in Bucharest met with an official in her Department on 1 March to make his concerns clear. Were minutes taken of that meeting, were they passed to the Minister, and who saw them in the Home Office? If she did not see them, why did she not?

Beverley Hughes: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already said today that a senior immigration and nationality directorate official visited Bucharest for talks on strengthening measures on illegal immigration and other matters, including the ECAA route. A report of that meeting was given to Ministers, or a record—

Mr. Cameron: This is vital to the issue that we are debating. If a report was given to Ministers about concerns in relation to immigrants from Romania and Bulgaria, why was that information not included in the Sutton inquiry when it was set up? Why do Ministers have to have the truth dragged from them bit by bit? Why do they not want to get to the truth?

Beverley Hughes: If the hon. Gentleman recalls, the shadow Home Secretary did not reveal the memo that would have been germane to the Sutton inquiry. I also remind Opposition Members that the subject of the allegations leading up to my statement on 8 March was specifically the eight accession countries and the allegation that Ministers had fast-tracked nationals from those countries in order to beat the deadline of 1 May. The focus was on the accession countries at that time.

As for the record of the Conservative party—

Mr. Clappison: Will the Minister give way?

Beverley Hughes: No, I want to make some progress.

I remind Conservative Members of the record of their party in government: no action on border controls, no review of immigration control, no action on people trafficking, and no action at all on the organised immigration crime that fuels much illegal entry. Since moving into opposition, its record has been characterised by hypocrisy. First, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), on becoming leader, paraded his migrant history. When he was Home Secretary, he and his party argued strongly in favour of EU enlargement, but he has since reversed his position on that. Secondly, he created a storm about our proposals to remove support for failed asylum-seeking families, when he had clearly forgotten that he took away support from all asylum seekers the moment that they claimed, which was overturned by the courts.

Mr. Gerrard: My right hon. Friend is talking about the record pre-1997. She may recall that in 1997, I and some other Labour Members used the word "amnesty", and I think that we were told by the then Home Secretary to wash our mouths out with soap and water. The Government then rightly embarked on a backlog clearance exercise, which was made public and which everyone knew about. Can she remind us how many backlog clearance exercises took place in the 1990s, which only came to light when the figures were published two or three years later?

Beverley Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend. As he knows, the Home Secretary yesterday put in the Library details of all those exercises that have taken place from 1988 onwards. Apart from the secret one, which was not disclosed at all—in marked contrast to the exercise that we announced in October—the other exercises were by and large what any sensible Government or Department would have to do. Backlogs are completely anathema to immigration control. If we have large backlogs, we are not managing the system properly. With proportionate and sensible measures, it makes sense to reduce backlogs as much as we can.

Mr. Garnier: Could the right hon. Lady give us a brief definition of her understanding of the concept of ministerial responsibility of the House?

Beverley Hughes: It is to do what I am doing—implementing the Government's policy and being responsible for dramatic and radical change in the asylum and immigration system. That is what I intend to go on doing.

Tory hypocrisy is reflected not just in the record of the Tories' new leader, but in their failure to support us in most of the tough measures we have included in legislation—and, I might say, in this kind of thing. I have here a sheaf of letters, including letters from the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and the hon. Members for Woking, for Witney (Mr. Cameron), for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), and the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). All the letters ask me to reverse decisions about constituents when the Department has decided that they should leave the country but those Conservative Members want them to stay. Conservative Members want me to use my discretion to overturn decisions that people should be removed from the country. I cannot see a Member on the Conservative Benches who has not written to me— [Interruption.] I must finish my speech. Our record, in contrast— [Interruption.]

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister is preening herself. Having raised this matter, why does she not read out the names of the constituents involved and really make a hash of it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not, strictly speaking, a point of order for the Chair. It is more a matter for debate. Let me say to the House that this is a serious matter. Members should listen to what the Minister is saying. They should also remember that people outside the Chamber are noting the way in which we behave inside it.

Beverley Hughes: In contrast, our record in government shows that we have instituted systematic, step-by-step reforms of asylum procedures. We have reduced the number of claims, there has been a record number of removals, we have speeded up decision making, we have acted on border controls and tackled organised immigration crime, and we have introduced a new charging regime. I repeat that I do not suggest that all the reforms we want are necessary. I am not saying that all parts of the organisation are yet as strong as I want them to be. We have seen over recent weeks that that is not the case. However, we are moving in the right direction, and we have made much more significant progress than the Tory party ever did.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Rather than engaging in knockabout, will the Minister focus on the future? The Home Secretary has suggested an investigation. Will the Minister commit herself to making it a full, public, independent investigation of the allegations that have been made?

Beverley Hughes: We shall have the inquiry that the Home Secretary has announced. I entirely accept what the hon. Gentleman has said: these are serious allegations which require a thorough investigation, and I want that to happen.

Hon. Members have asked me a number of questions. I shall probably not be able to deal with all of them, and I hope that they will allow me to write to them about some of them. In answer to the question about whether there was any reason to suspect that the inquiry would not be legal, I can say that there is no reason to believe that the action we have taken today would be open to legal challenge. We have explored the position, and I think that our action would be generally accepted as a sensible measure. Not only will we suspend applications under the ECAA, for a short period we will suspend all applications for any purpose from Bulgaria and Romania to ensure that we have a complete view of what is happening there.

The Home Secretary has dealt with the specific allegations against me in some detail. Let me simply say that I would not be interested in hanging on to office if

I knew in my own mind that I had a personal case to answer, because it is what is in my head and on my conscience that matters to me. I would never compromise my integrity or my honesty, and I am not resigning because my conscience is clear. I believe that, working with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, I have made systematic and significant progress in implementing our policy and delivering real change and improvements. I am neither incompetent nor dishonest and I intend to carry on doing my job as long as the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary want me to do so.

Tellers for the Noes:
Ms Bridget Prentice and Vernon Coaker

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the Government on having embarked on radical end-to-end reform of the immigration and asylum system including strengthening border controls, reducing asylum intake by more than half, increasing immigration removals to record levels and speeding up the processing of applications for leave to remain in the UK; notes that, as indicated in a statement published by the Government on 29th March, all Governments have instituted reasonable and proportionate measures to deal with backlogs of applications by people already in this country for permission to extend their stay; and applauds the fact that the Government, by investing more staff resources than ever before, has reached the point where the Backlog Reduction Accelerated Clearance Exercise (BRACE) is no longer necessary.

EU Constitution Referendum

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): We now come to the next debate on the Opposition motions. Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.16 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House believes that the draft European Constitution constitutes a fundamental change to the relationship between the European Union and the Member States and should only be ratified if the British people have freely consented to it in a referendum.

I wish to apologise at this stage because, for personal reasons that I have explained to Ministers and to the Liberal Democrat spokesman, I will have to leave during the course of the debate and I will not be present for the wind-ups. However, I make no apology for once again initiating a debate on the draft constitution and the need for a referendum. This is a vital issue—

Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my theme a little, I will give way to him in due course.

The Leader of the House may in the past have belittled the constitution as a tidying up measure. It has always been considerably more than that. That is why the failure to agree it in Brussels in December was greeted with such anger and frustration by Europe's arch-integrationists. Now it is back. I am not surprised: I know how much it means to those in Europe who seek a single European state and who were never going to let it rest. I watched with some amusement the attempts of the Government to pretend that it was off the agenda and was likely to be so for some time. That was always a typical new Labour smokescreen, behind which this coyly integrationist Government could seek to ensure that this integrationist constitution would come back with a vengeance, and with as little time to oppose it as possible.

Last Friday ended what must be the most bizarre set of gyrations and about-turns performed by a Government on a major issue for a very long time. It is worth recalling the sequence of events. In 1999, the then Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), told the House:

"For the record, we are not proposing a constitution of Europe."—[Official Report, 25 May 1999; Vol. 332, c. 184.]

The Prime Minister, in Warsaw in October 2000, told us that a constitution was "unnecessary". In Cardiff, in November 2002, the Prime Minister told us that "we do need a proper Constitution for Europe."

Yesterday, according to the Prime Minister, it was apparently anti-European to be against a constitution. Even chameleons do not change their colours that quickly. But this is the party and the Prime Minister who, in 1983, stood on the platform of withdrawal from Europe. Whatever the reasons for the U-turns, high principle certainly is not one of them.

[Mr. Ancram]

Let us consider the past four months. The constitution that the Prime Minister told us last summer was "essential" for enlargement of the EU was suddenly no longer essential in December. We were told that we could get by with the Nice treaty. A "senior Government source", later unmasked as the Foreign Secretary, remarked last November that a constitution would be "highly desirable" but not "absolutely necessary".

Furthermore, if we are to believe the article on page 21 of the Financial Times today, after the failure to achieve agreement on the constitution in Brussels last December, the Foreign Secretary sent a memo to the Prime Minister advising him to do nothing to revive it. That is until last Friday, when suddenly the newly revived constitution was apparently once more essential for enlargement to work. A lawyer or accountant giving such confused advice would quickly be sued for professional negligence.

Alan Howarth: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is asking for rigour in these matters, so, given that the draft constitution is only a recommendation to the intergovernmental conference and that that conference has not yet made its recommendations to the legislatures of the member states, how can he know at this stage that the issues for decision would be worth a referendum? Is he not simply whipping up anti-European sentiment to exploit it for party political purposes?

Mr. Ancram: The right hon. Gentleman has been in politics for a very long time and he can read the runes as well as I can. Does he really believe that the Irish presidency would have announced that it would return to the constitution without being pretty well assured that everything was signed, sealed and delivered? I think that there will be very few changes, but it will be interesting to see what happens on 18 June—when in this country we shall of course be celebrating the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Is not the worry that the constitution is not already signed and sealed, and that the Irish Prime Minister is telling the truth when he says that it is still to be agreed and that further compromises are necessary? It is in those circumstances that it is so important to put the constitution to the people of this country. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that if that were the Government's position we would not need this debate?

Mr. Ancram: That would certainly be the case but, unfortunately, that is not where we are. In politics, I am a great believer in starting from where we find ourselves, but I agree that the position outlined by the right hon. Gentleman would have been preferable.

Some changes have to be made in the positions that were held in December. For instance, we know that the Spanish and the Polish Governments will have to move from their former position on weighted voting, but all the indications are that both have decided to do so. I may be anticipating the final outcome, but I suspect that I shall be right in my judgment that the constitution will be much as it is now.

The only explanation for the twisting and turning of the past months is that the Prime Minister, in his much-vaunted determination never to be isolated in Europe, is fulfilling that ambition by simply going with the flow—always accepting the position in which the constitution happens to be at a particular time. I have tried hard to understand the Government's position. I have listened closely to the Prime Minister. I quote again from the speech he made in Cardiff on 28 November 2002, when he talked of a "one-off opportunity for reform: to set Europe on a clear course for the future, a Europe that . . . can be a superpower".

In January 2002, according to the Leader of the House, the Prime Minister told his colleagues that the constitution

"will define the relationship between Britain and the rest of Europe . . . and it would last for generations".

In June last year, the Prime Minister suddenly told Parliament that the constitution

"does not involve a fundamental change to the British constitution."—[Official Report, 18 June 2003; Vol. 407, c. 352.]

From that series of remarks, one can pick whichever position one wants. They do not give us much confidence that the Prime Minister has a clear view of what the constitution stands for.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, but I want to make some progress.

I have also been listening to the Leader of the House; after all, he was the Minister for Europe for a considerable period. On 21 March 2002, he told the Convention on the Future of Europe that he was looking for "nothing less than the creation of a new constitutional order for a new united Europe".

That is very different language from that of the Prime Minister in the remarks I just quoted. Of course, the Leader of the House is the same man who, on 26 May last year, described the constitution as a "tidying-up exercise". Once again, on the Government's position, "you pays your money and you takes your choice". Either the Government, jointly and severally, have no idea what the constitution is about, or they are deliberately trying to pull the wool over the eyes of the British people and of Parliament.

What we can be clear about is that there is no such ambivalence or confusion across the channel. Our partners in Europe know what the constitution is about. The accession countries have their doubts, as I have discovered on recent visits, but they will be reluctant to push those doubts too far until they are full members. Traditional integrationist Europe—the Europe of Chancellor Schröder and Giscard d'Estaing—has no such doubts. The constitution is federalist, integrationist and, in their minds, urgent. The Belgian Prime Minister referred to it as the "capstone" of a "federal state". On 14 June last year, Joschka Fischer, the German Foreign Minister, described it as "worthy of the word historic" and as "the most important treaty since the formation of the European economic community."

Last May, the Danish Prime Minister said:

"What is at stake is so new and big that it is right to hold a referendum."

Former Italian Prime Minister, Lamberto Dini, said:

"The constitution is not just an intellectual exercise. It will quickly change people's lives".

So why is it that our Government are so alone in arguing that the constitution is not significant? It can only be because their agenda is to try to get us into an integrationist Europe, effectively without anyone noticing. That is why, when they are challenged, as the Prime Minister was by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition yesterday, they retreat into spurious and polarising arguments about the choice being not between the constitution and other solutions to the problems of Europe, but between being in Europe or getting out. That is a fraudulent argument, designed to divert attention from the Europe that they really want.

Mr. Hendrick: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for giving way, but does he not agree that, even though enlargement could go ahead on the basis of the Nice treaty, the EU will have 25 member states and a multiplicity of texts will make up the treaties, so it is simpler to shrink those texts into a constitution and add a little bit as well, which is effectively what the constitution will do?

Mr. Ancram: None of us argues that Nice alone is the perfect way to manage a Europe of 25 states, but I am absolutely certain that a full-blown constitution is not needed to do that. That is the point that we are making, and I shall come to it in a moment.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): Before we leave the right hon. and learned Gentleman's view of history, will he forgive me for finding it a little difficult to take? Does he recollect that he was the Conservative candidate against me in West Lothian in February 1974? I have the clear recollection—I do not think that I am wrong—that he was not a whit behind Edward Heath in being ardent for Europe.

Mr. Ancram: I hate to quibble with the hon. Gentleman's memory, but rather than February 1974, when I was fighting in East Lothian, I fought him in June 1970, when the situation was somewhat different. Indeed, I was one of a number of failed candidates who, having lost the election, wrote a letter to a national newspaper calling for a free vote on the accession Bill in 1972. That perhaps underlines the position that I took then and what my view is.

Unlike the Government, my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition set out his alternative European vision in a speech that he gave in Berlin on 13 February. He spoke of a flexible Europe—a live and let live Europe that is more co-operative and less prescriptive, more varied and less conformist, based on a completed single market, working together in areas where joint action is beneficial, but able, without tension, to differ where necessary. He spoke of a Europe where the sovereignty of the nation state is the foundation. That is not the Europe of the constitution. Ours is an alternative vision of Europe that we believe is more attuned to the challenges of an increasingly globalised 21st century.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the real choice for an enlarged Europe is whether to have a new constitutional treaty or to continue with the existing constitutional treaties? As it appears unlikely that, by the next election, all 25 member states will have ratified whatever treaty is eventually agreed, will he confirm that the pressure for negotiation only extends to any new treaty and that any Conservative Government would not try to reopen the existing treaties on which we function at the moment—all of which have been negotiated by Conservative Governments of which he and I were members or supporters?

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend—[Interruption.] Labour Members obviously have difficulty hearing.

My right hon. and learned Friend asks an important question. We have always said—and we say again—that had we been in government now, we would have used the period of the negotiation and renegotiation, which has been part of what the convention has been doing for the past two years, to make changes to the existing treaties. For example, we have made it clear for some time that we are not happy with the common fisheries policy; we believe that it is destroying the fishing industry in this country. Had we been the Government, we would have made that part of what we were negotiating in the course of the run-up to where we are now. If there is not a ratified and implemented treaty by the time we get back to government, Europe as a whole will have to look to see what it is going to do in future.

One veto prevents the treaty from happening at all. If that happens, we will, of course, have renegotiation just as this Government have renegotiated every time—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I have given the answer.

Mr. Clarke: Let us leave aside the fisheries policy on which our party has had the same policy ever since it went into opposition. If we say that the other member states were not persuaded that we should leave the common fisheries policy and one or two of them vetoed that, what would we then do? Presumably we would continue with the existing treaties.

My right hon. and learned Friend mentions the common fisheries policy and I am familiar with our position on that. I trust that the fish understand it as well as the fishermen. However, what other things would we negotiate in the existing treaties? Do we intend to open up anything from the treaty of accession, the treaty of Maastricht or the treaty of Nice? What are the other things that we would be seeking to negotiate?

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend is, I have to say, asking speculative questions. The point is that—and it is a very clear point—if, by the time we get back to government after the next election, this treaty has not been ratified by every country in Europe and if we refuse to ratify it, as we would, there will be no treaty. We will then have to look at the current position and the existing treaties and will have to decide what can be kept and what cannot be kept in view of the enlargement of Europe. A whole area of renegotiation will be required. What we have been looking for all along is a simplification of the process in Europe and a simplification of the competences in Europe so that, at the end of the day, it is easier for the people of Europe to understand. I know where my right hon. and learned Friend is coming from, but he is not helping his cause by trying to open questions about the veto.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): My right hon. and hon. Friends should remember that the Conservative party opposed the Nice treaty and the treaty of Amsterdam, which were negotiated badly by the Labour Government. We object very strongly to this constitution and those treaties for transferring many powers too far from our democratic rights in this country. My right hon. and learned Friend has my full support and that of most Conservative Members in making these points.

Mr. Ancram: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend for making that clear. I also remind my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) that, at Laeken, the remit given to the convention was to try to simplify the process by which an enlarged Europe would be run and also to reconnect the European institutions with the people of Europe, who are being increasingly alienated from them. That, in itself, was looking for a renegotiation of the way that Europe is run. If we have not got a treaty as I hope that we have not when we return to power after the next election, that is precisely what we shall be returning to.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con) rose—

Mr. Clarke rose—

Mr. Ancram: I shall give way one more time to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend. I am intervening frequently and he is being extremely generous.

If we find we have the existing treaty, if we press points of renegotiation, and, presumably, if any one of the other 24 members does not agree with the points that we are making, it will veto them and we will be left with the existing treaty. What would we do if our negotiating points were blocked and we were not able to get unanimous agreement to reopen the treaty of accession, the treaty of Maastricht, the treaty of Amsterdam or the treaty of Nice that comprise the present constitution of the Union? What would we do if any one of the 24 blocked any particular change that we were seeking?

Mr. Ancram: I do not know how my right hon. and learned Friend conducts negotiations, but I always go into them intending to try to achieve what I seek to achieve. When Lady Thatcher was Prime Minister she was told frequently that she was never going to achieve the rebate by negotiation. She went in determined to achieve it and negotiated brilliantly, as my right hon. and learned Friend remembers, and she achieved what she sought. That is the spirit in which we would enter renegotiations if such a situation arose.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Ancram: May I make a little progress?

Last Friday, the Prime Minister called for a real debate to dispel what he called the myths. If his call were genuine, he would abandon the myth that we are seeking withdrawal. He knows that that is not true, and when he returned to the point yesterday, he diminished the value of the debate that he wants. He should also abandon the myths that he is not an integrationist and that the constitution is not the gateway to a single European state.

Let us consider briefly the constitution. It is no mere charter of competencies of the sort with which we would have been happy, as I said to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe. It does not just define lines and levels of authority, but sets out an agenda: the creation of a political entity that would soon become a single European state. It is a constitution, and states have constitutions. We oppose a single European state, so we oppose a constitution.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): Golf clubs have them.

Mr. Ancram: If the Foreign Secretary thinks that we are talking about a golf club with regard to the constitution, he should study it more carefully.

The constitution would create a single legal personality for Europe for the first time. A single legal personality is the hallmark of a state. For the first time, it will constitutionally assert the authority of European law over all national laws and constitutions. Totally contrary to the Government's pledged position, the constitution will incorporate the charter of fundamental rights, give that legal status and make it legally binding. Through the constitution, contrary to pledges made in Britain, the Government have agreed to a separate European military planning capability that will undermine NATO. It creates a five-year presidency and a Foreign Minister with his own diplomatic service—it is called an external action service to lessen the impact of that—that will increasingly move powers on asylum and immigration policy to the European Union. The constitution will abolish more than 30 national vetoes, and anyone who says that it is not a centralising and integrationist measure has not studied its details.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Just to spare me from endless sleepless nights, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman clear up one little query that I have had for a considerable time after listening to Conservative Members debating the constitution? I am sure that he knows that the principle of the supremacy of Community law was established in—I think—1962.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): 1964.

Lady Hermon: It was 1964—I thank the hon. Gentleman, who always keeps me right. The principle was established in the landmark decision on Costa v. ENEL in 1964. The principle of the supremacy of Community law was well known to the Tory Government who took this country into Europe. This country's courts have applied and given supremacy to Community law for 30 years, so what is the big issue about it appearing in the constitution?

Mr. Ancram: The simple answer to the hon. Lady's important question is that up until now, the primacy or supremacy of European law over national laws has flowed from treaties that were agreed by nations and could be changed by nations. We are talking about the creation of a constitution from which such authority will flow down. That is a different animal from the previous situation. We emphasise the point because we are talking about a changed animal—it moves from being a Europe of nations to something much closer to being a nation of Europe.

Mr. Cash: In endorsing what my right hon. and learned Friend has said, does he accept that only a few days ago, the House of Lords European Union Committee issued a report that made it quite clear that the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary are wrong to state repeatedly that there will be no fundamental change to the relationship between the European Union and its member states? In fact, the House of Lords Committee says that there is a new arrangement for competencies. It was completely wrong of the Foreign Secretary to continue to assert that outrageous statement in Foreign Office questions today.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has spent much time studying the technicalities, and I bow to his knowledge of them.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I shall give way in a moment.

We are considering whether the constitution is a fundamental change in the relationships between the EU and its member states. That was the test for a referendum set by the Prime Minister. My argument is that when all the various points that I have outlined are added together, it is clear that the relationship and the direction of power are changing. That is why we are pressing so hard for a referendum.

Mr. MacShane: It is important to have on the record that paragraph 25 of the House of Lords report states:

"The new wording of the primary obligation of the Court would be unlikely to bring about any change in the Court's role and approach in ensuring compliance with and the consistent application of Union law."

In other words, it underlines the very point made by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon).

Mr. Ancram: Once again, as he so often does, the Minister for Europe has completely missed the point.

The constitution not only makes the changes that I have described, but sets out wider aspirations for the future. It does so in terms that leave little room for misunderstanding. On the economy, article I-14 states:

"The Union shall adopt measures to ensure coordination of the economic policies of the Member States, in particular by adopting broad guidelines for these policies. The Member States shall coordinate their economic policies within the Union."

Let me ask the Foreign Secretary how that general aspiration will work in the long term without tax harmonisation, and is that article as it stands in the constitution acceptable to the Government?

Mr. Straw indicated dissent.

Mr. Ancram: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Having told me that there is to be no change, he will apparently be seeking change. Perhaps he will enlighten us.

Mr. Straw: The wording of articles I-11 and I-14 is unacceptable. We have proposed amendments to change the wording so that it becomes consistent with the articles in part III—69 or 70, or thereabouts—and makes it clear that it is the role of member states, not of the Union, to co-ordinate their economic policies. We made that position clear as long ago as September last year in the White Paper.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the Foreign Secretary for clearing up the question whether that remains the Government's position. May I ask him another question? Article I-15, on foreign and security policy, states:

"Member States shall actively and unreservedly support the Union's common foreign and security policy in a spirit of loyalty and mutual solidarity and shall comply with the acts adopted by the Union in this area."

What does that mean in the long term if not a single foreign and security policy, subject—as it would be, if the constitution goes through as it is now—to the European Court of Justice? Is that acceptable to the Government?

Mr. Straw: First, the current draft makes it absolutely clear that it will not be subject to the European Court of Justice. Secondly, if the right hon. Gentleman wants to know what the words mean, he should ask himself. They are identical to those found in the Maastricht treaty, for which he voted.

Mr. Ancram: I am asking the Government, who are, as I understand it, negotiating the treaty, what their view of its meaning is. Apparently, Ministers have no view other than the one held by Opposition Front Benchers. The House has a right to know what the Government envisage will be the outturn of such articles, if they sign up to them.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): My right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. I hope that he picks up the mistake that the Foreign Secretary just made. The right hon. Gentleman asserted that the European Court of Justice will not have jurisdiction over article I-15. In fact, the relevant article, III-282, makes it clear that the Court has no jurisdiction only in respect of articles I-39 and I-40. Therefore, article I-15—the solidarity clause that imposes an obligation on member states—will be justiciable in the European Court of Justice. That clearly contradicts what we have just been told by the Foreign Secretary, who ought by now to have read the draft treaty that he is about to negotiate.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. The answers that I am trying to secure are coming from my right hon. and hon. Friends, not from the Government. That goes back to what I was saying earlier. The Government do not understand what this constitution is about and what they are trying to get the UK to sign up for. This is a one-way ticket on a line to a single destination. It can be called a step change or a gateway, but it cannot be called insignificant. It shifts sovereignty away from the nation states towards the centre, and in doing so it changes the relationships. I happen to believe that that is dangerous and wrong.

We are constantly being told by those on the Government Front Bench that we are alone in our views. However, what about the peoples of Europe? How many of them are straining at the leash for this constitution? How many of them raised their voices in resentment or concern when agreement on the constitution was not reached in December? How many demonstrations have there ever been? We must remember that the whole idea of the constitutional convention was to try to bring Europe closer to the people. It is time that Governments began to listen more closely to what their people are telling them.

Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: No. I shall make some progress.

Indeed, that was what Laeken was supposed to be about. The task was to reconnect institutions to people, to give them a sense of ownership again. Under Valery Giscard d'Estaing, it did precisely the opposite. Within the constitution it centralised powers, it altered fundamentally the relationship between the EU and its member states, and it moved from a Europe of nations towards something that is profoundly different. That is not what the peoples of Europe want, as we saw from the recent survey, nor what we want.

It is apparently what the Government want. If not, why the rush to seek to ratify any June agreement as soon as possible, which I think were the words of the Prime Minister? They have no mandate for this constitution. It was not in the Labour party's manifesto. We will use every parliamentary device to thwart attempts to railroad this wretched constitution through Parliament.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD) rose—

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD) rose—

Mr. Ancram: Does the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) wish to intervene? I promised that I would let him do so.

Sir Menzies Campbell: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has moved on rather from the point. I am finding great difficulty following his position with regard to the relationship between the domestic laws of the United Kingdom and what was Community and is now Union law. If Community and now Union law has supremacy over the domestic laws of the UK so far as is relevant, how can there be any material difference if that matter is now stated ex facie over the proposed treaty, as compared with the circumstances that have obtained since 1972?

Mr. Ancram: I know exactly where the right hon. and learned Gentleman is coming from. He has been very consistent on his views on Europe. The misunderstanding between us is that we are opposed to a constitution because a constitution changes the nature of Europe. The primacy of law that flows from a constitution rather than from treaties, which are signed by individual member states, is a different thing. That is why we are taking the view that we are.

Richard Younger-Ross: A moment ago the right hon. Gentleman told the House that the Conservative party wants to use every parliamentary opportunity to hold this process under scrutiny. Is this a change in policy, bearing in mind the number of times that the Committee considering the draft constitution fell and would be inquorate because Conservative Members did not bother to turn up?

Mr. Ancram: I will say again that if there is an attempt, in our view, to railroad the ratification of this constitution through Parliament—some of the words that have been spoken over the past five days suggest that that is the Government's intention—I give warning that we will use every parliamentary device that we can to thwart that.

There is a simple, fair and democratic answer. That is a referendum that allows the British people to decide. This constitution irrevocably draws sovereignty away from the nation state towards the centre. I passionately believe that no Government and no parliament have the right permanently to alienate the sovereignty of the people without their express consent. That is why I believe that in the current situation a referendum is essential, and that to refuse one is to strike another nail into the coffin of democratic credibility.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ancram: I really must make progress.

I cannot understand the Government's reluctance to hold a referendum unless they are frightened of the result and are frightened of the electorate. They can have no objection in principle. They hold referendums on almost everything else. Can they not understand the resentment that their refusal to hold a referendum invokes? The British people are not to be trusted with such an important decision, we understand. The Danes are, the Irish are, the Dutch are and the Portuguese are. There will be many other countries that will have the courage and honesty to hold a referendum. Apparently the British will not be trusted. That is a patronising insult.

If ever there has been an issue where the people have the right to say yes or no, it must be this. The decisions that we are about to take are historic. They will help to shape the future and surely people in such an instance have the right to have a say.

The coming European elections, despite the wild assertions of the Leader of the House last August, are no surrogate for a referendum, but I hope that the voters will use them to give the Government the clearest possible message that they want a referendum and that they will not be ignored. The Government should, for once, show some moral fibre, trust the people and let the people decide.

4.50 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the intensified scrutiny of both Houses in respect of the draft Constitutional Treaty; believes that the Government's policy of active engagement within the EU is in Britain's national interests; supports its constructive approach to discussions within the Intergovernmental Conference to ensure that an enlarged Union works effectively; endorses paragraph 66 of the White Paper (Cm 5934) in respect of issues which must remain the province of the nation state; notes that provided there is a satisfactory outcome on these and other matters of concern, the proposals currently being discussed would not alter the fundamental constitutional relationship between the member states and the Union and therefore does not believe there is reason to depart from previous practice for constitutional treaties; and reaffirms the primacy of Parliament to decide on whether any future Constitutional Treaty should become part of UK law."

I begin by warmly thanking the shadow Foreign Secretary for laying on the debate, which has exposed so acutely the fundamental divisions inside the Conservative party on the European Union and the incoherence of the case that he makes.

The Government's overall position on the new draft constitutional treaty was clearly set out in the White Paper, which I put before Parliament on 9 September last year and which stands as Government policy. In making the case for the proposed amendment to the motion before the House, I want to answer four key questions. They are: why is a new treaty needed? What did the Convention recommend? What changes are the Government seeking to make to any treaty to make it acceptable to the UK? What is our approach to a referendum in those circumstances?

I shall deal first with the case for a new treaty. As the Union has grown in size, so its functions have developed—most significantly through the Single European Act, from a customs union to a single market, and through the Maastricht treaty, to take in common foreign and security policy, justice and home affairs, and the single currency. As a result, the texts setting out what the Union is for and how it works are both dated and complicated. Its decision-making machinery is inadequate to cope effectively with 25 and more members, developed as it was for six member states. The treaties that embody the EU's constitution do not explain clearly where the division of powers rests between the nations and the Union.

The result of the Convention's labours is to be found in the draft constitution, which I put before the House in August. It revises some of the text, and proposes other changes that are essentially aimed at improving decision making in the Union and in respect of some of its powers. Article I-1 of the draft makes it clear that the EU draws those powers from the member states, rather than the other way round. Article I-9 says clearly that "competences not conferred upon the Union. . .remain with the Member States".

That is the first time that such a clear statement has been made.

Article I-59 provides explicitly—also for the first time—for member states to withdraw from the European Union, if they so decide. It is not the case, as the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) asserted a few moments ago, that if the draft constitutional treaty becomes our law and that of the EU, it will be any different a constitutional animal in terms of international or domestic law from the treaties that have gone before. It is exactly the same in every particular.

Mr. Cash: Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: I shall make some progress; then I shall give way, as ever, to the hon. Gentleman.

The draft treaty must be agreed in the same way by a process of political agreement, signature by member states, and then ratification by countries' domestic constitutional procedures. It must be changed in exactly the same way, with this difference: if a member state wishes to leave the EU—as some Opposition Members wish to do—a procedure allows them to avoid having to go through the rather complicated and uncertain procedure of renunciation of the whole treaty.

We set out in the White Paper our objectives for the intergovernmental conference. Far from trying to hide our position under some bushel, we have been explicit in debate after debate in the Chamber and in the Committees that we have established, in order that Parliament be fully involved in the process, as it should be.

Mr. Cash: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: In a moment.

We stated at paragraph 66 of the White Paper that we would not sign any treaty that removed the veto for treaty change or for "areas of vital national interest such as tax, social security, defence, key areas of criminal procedural law and the system of own resources".

In the 10 weeks of the intergovernmental conference process between October and December last year, we sought, and obtained, many important changes to the draft text—I moved the amendments and got them accepted. We have made it absolutely clear that the so-called European Foreign Minister remains responsible to member states through the Council of Ministers, and is not responsible to the Commission. We reached an agreement on defence co-operation, which will give the EU the capacity to intervene militarily—which I thought would be welcomed on both sides of the House—but only in a way that complements NATO, which remains the cornerstone of our territorial defence.

Among the other changes that we have made, we have altered the so-called escalator clause, which was of genuine concern, by ensuring that further treaty changes can happen only if all national Parliaments, as well as member state Governments, explicitly agree to them. The escalator clause was unacceptable.

The issue should be of particular interest to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes. Last October, he was interviewed on "Today", and he spelled out in his usual modest and understated way how the Government were about to sell out 1,000 years of history. It was put to him that the Government were successfully winning the arguments in the intergovernmental conference on the key areas, to which he said:

"Well, let's test that. Are they"—

the Government—

"going to get rid of the so-called escalator clause . . . which means that in the future the vetoes can be changed by decision of the Council of Ministers without reference back to Treaties or to national Parliaments . . . If that escalator clause stays in they're whistling in the wind and they know it."

Well, we have passed the right hon. and learned Gentleman's test because we got the escalator clause changed. The draft agreement proposed at Naples satisfactorily changed that part of the treaty, in a manner that I proposed. We will not sign up to any final treaty unless that change, and a number of others, are in it.

Mr. Cash: On the question of which court should have the final say on whether a matter is within the competence of the Union, the Foreign Secretary will know that the House of Lords European Union Committee report—I am sure that he has read it—states explicitly:

"What is new is the classification and division of competences set out in . . . the draft Treaty. The critical question is which court . . . will finally decide whether a matter falls within Union competence. This is not just a drafting question . . . but an issue touching upon the fundamental nature of the Union and its relationship with the Member States."

In line with the Foreign Secretary's assertion that this Parliament is supreme—at last he agrees with me—is not the only answer to introduce a Bill to put the matter beyond all doubt, so that, if Parliament decides that they should do so, our judges will bring into effect any provision that is expressly, clearly and unambiguously inconsistent with the European Communities Act 1972?

Mr. Straw: I agree with the hon. Gentleman every time he makes that proposition. We could have a Bill to that effect tomorrow, and no one could prevent us from passing it if it were the will of this House and of the House of Lords. However, all our actions have consequences, and although he could have such a Bill, he could not be a member of the European Union as it is constituted, and he could not be a member of the European Union as it would be constituted under any future constitutional treaty.

I have addressed the issue of primacy with great care because a number of Government and Opposition Members have raised it as a matter of concern. The purpose of the high level of scrutiny that the Government have established is to ensure that, when hon. Members on either side of the House raise issues that are worth pursuing, we pursue them. We did that on energy, for example, which the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), first identified. That issue had not been identified before, concern was shared on both sides of the House, and we got the article changed satisfactorily.

EU law has had primacy over domestic law since the European Court of Justice decision in 1964. So far as the United Kingdom is concerned, EU law has had primacy over domestic law since we signed up through the 1972 Act. We have been round this track, and I will not bore the House again.

Mr. Cash: Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: No, I will not. I am answering the hon. Gentleman's question, and I ask him to listen, as I listen to him.

Section 2 of the 1972 Act makes absolutely explicit this Parliament's decision to recognise European law as supreme. That was a condition of our entry to the European Union. We could withdraw from that if we wanted—the hon. Gentleman could have his Bill—but we cannot have our cake and eat it. He should bear in mind that there will be many opportunities to examine the issue of primacy further. Our judgment in the Foreign Office, and that of the Council's legal adviser, is that article 1(10) and the declaration alongside it mean that the status of primacy will not be altered. I am happy to examine in detail the House of Lords report and the additional points made by the hon. Gentleman, and if we decide that we are wrong, I will be happy to pursue them.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend clarify a matter that concerns me? If, in the course of demands for harmonisation, it was decided that the principle that the national health service should be free at the point of use was incompatible with health systems throughout the Community, which rely almost entirely on insurance-based schemes that are differently organised so that up-front payment is essential, would we be able to retain our system, or would we be told that it was incompatible owing to European law?

Mr. Straw: I very much doubt that that would ever happen. In any event, the issue of primacy is not affected by the draft treaty. Let me be clear, however, that if the European Court of Justice sought to do that, there would be a political crisis that would affect our membership of the European Union and be a matter for concern for all Members on both sides of the House.

The intergovernmental conference process was suspended last December because no agreement on the voting system was possible. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House yesterday, we expect negotiations to resume shortly. Parliament has been involved in those negotiations to an unprecedented degree.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): The Foreign Secretary glossed over an important point. A few months ago, the Government were happy to see discussions at the intergovernmental conference run into the buffers. Now, they are very anxious to advance the issue. In the course of the past week or two, there has been a distinct change in the Government's approach. I would be grateful if the Foreign Secretary gave a detailed explanation for that, because in its absence many will conclude that it flows from events in Madrid a few weeks ago.

Mr. Straw: There has been no change in the Government's approach. Had Spain, Poland, France and Germany been ready to reach an agreement on voting systems, it is highly probable that, by the end of the Italian presidency or very early on in the Irish presidency, we would have agreed on all the other outstanding issues, including those that were outstanding for the United Kingdom. That was impossible because of the total disagreement between those four nations. The position of two of those countries—Spain and Poland—has changed, and as a result the negotiations have opened up.

Mr. Trimble: The Foreign Secretary is identifying the changes in Poland that flowed from the changes in Spain—which changes were produced by what? We are left with the impression that this Government's policy and approach have changed as a result of the actions of al-Qaeda.

Mr. Straw: Of course I understand the high sensitivity to terrorism in Northern Ireland. I have no wish to subscribe to the view that is current in some circles that the Madrid bombing caused the change of Government in Madrid. All I can say to the right hon. Gentleman is that we will never know exactly what led to the late change in voting intentions in Spain. There have been many other examples of voting intentions changing at a late stage of a campaign. However, Prime Minister Zapatero has said repeatedly that, as far as he is concerned, he won the election as a result of four years of campaigning, not because of the events of four days. The previous Spanish Government might have changed their position after the elections in any event. We simply do not know. To pick up a point that the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes made, we must deal with where we are. It is where we believed that we might be in November and December but happened not to be—namely, with the negotiations in hand.

Let me deal with the fourth question, which is about our approach to a referendum. The main case for a referendum is founded on the assertion that a constitution for the European Union will be such a decisive step towards a European superstate that it will end Britain's sovereignty. The right hon. and learned Member for Devizes came close to asserting that this afternoon. Yesterday's Daily Mail put matters in its customary way and stated:

"The constitution will destroy our power to govern ourselves".

It continued by saying that it would

"dismantle Britain as a functioning nation state".

That doom-laden hyperbole is so far removed from the facts that it is tempting to ignore it. However, we cannot do so because that systematic exaggeration of the threat to our nationhood has, over the years, set the framework for a national debate on Europe. So the answer to the question, "Will the draft European constitution end the sovereignty of the nation?" has to be: no. The House of Lords Select Committee on the European Union explicitly stated that "the draft Treaty makes plain ... that the European Union remains a union of sovereign Member States".

Its earlier report stated that "it is clear that the balance of power in the European Union is going to shift from the Commission in favour of the Member States if the"

Convention's "proposals are adopted".

Of course, that does not stop some Conservative Members wilfully misinterpreting the draft treaty. Let us consider the example of the proposed president of the European Council. The right hon. and learned Member for Devizes said that that was further evidence of development into a nation state, ignoring that there is already a president of the European Commission and a president of the European Parliament. The constitution as drafted will ensure that the Union's agenda is better set by elected representatives of national Governments in the European Council. Instead of the manifest inefficiencies and inconsistencies of the rotating six-month presidency, the member states will choose a president of the European Council to chair their meetings and ensure that their decisions are followed up.

Mr. Ancram: That is centralising.

Mr. Straw: No, it is not. It will ensure greater power in the hands of member states against the overbearing power of the Commission. I believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be in favour of it. The president will have no decision-making power. It is striking that only two groups are against the proposal—the Conservative party and the European Commission. That underlines the incoherence of the Conservative party's position. The proposal means that member states will remove power from the Commission. The right hon. and learned Gentleman should consider its merits instead of dismissing it in the pursuit of a myth about a European superstate.

Another claim that the peddlers of the superstate myth make is that the draft treaty massively extends majority voting. Let us consider the reality. The Single European Act of 1986 introduced majority voting for almost all matters to do with the single market. As Lord Heseltine told radio listeners last Saturday, that measure was "far and away more significant in the surrender"—

his words, not mine—

"of British sovereignty than anything involved in the present constitution".

He added that "it never occurred to" Mrs. Thatcher "to have a referendum".

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Foreign Secretary is right that the Single European Act was the most significant step forward. It was agreed under a Conservative Government and, incidentally, supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), who voted for it. Before that Act was passed, was not it subject to scrutiny in the House of Commons? Is not that the best way in which to consider the detail of any constitutional treaty that might emerge after Dublin?

Mr. Straw: Let me make it clear that I am committed to the maximum scrutiny for any constitutional treaty. I say to hon. Members who may be worried about that that they do not have to look into the crystal ball, because they can examine the record. I have been complimented by hon. Members of all parties on the amount of scrutiny of the draft that has already been achieved. I only regret that the shadow Foreign Secretary has not bothered to turn up to one sitting of the Committee that considers the intergovernmental conference report.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will the Foreign Secretary acknowledge that many of us do not accept the doom-laden hyperbole, as he put it, and are sceptical of those fair-weather friends of referendums who allowed referendums on nothing while in government and now want referendums on everything in opposition? Nevertheless, we feel strongly that when there is a significant change to the relationship between the European Union and the people of this country, it should be with the informed consent of the people of this country, not simply through a vote in this House or in the Council of Ministers?

Mr. Straw: I respect the hon. Gentleman's position, as his and his party's position has been consistent, and it lies in his mouth, not in the mouth of the Conservative party.

Mr. Frank Field: I am grateful that my right hon. Friend says that he believes in as much detailed discussion as possible. Can he tell us how many times the Cabinet has considered this draft treaty in detail? Was it a Cabinet decision that we should not have a referendum?

Mr. Straw: We have considered it endlessly. The draft White Paper was crawled over by my right hon. Friends, on which I insisted, and I was responsible with officials for drafting it. I spent a large part of what was otherwise classified as a summer holiday working through its detailed text, as I regarded it as an extremely important document, and I also made sure that each of my Cabinet colleagues, who had responsibility for areas in it, knew exactly what they were signing up to. It has therefore been a Cabinet decision. I invite my right hon. Friend to come along—I cannot recall his assiduous attendance at various Committees and debates on the Floor of the House, but I look forward to it—to further considerations.

Mr. Field: On the issue of a referendum, was it a Cabinet decision?

Mr. Straw: It has been a Cabinet decision, of course.

Let me make some more progress. After the Single European Act, we had Maastricht. The shadow Foreign Secretary always tries to forget about Maastricht, and we know why. The Maastricht treaty introduced majority voting to fundamental areas of policy making: the Union's broad guidelines on economic policy; its excessive deficits procedure; education; public health; consumer protection; trans-European networks; overseas aid; and the implementation of decisions within the common foreign and security policy. This was a treaty that John Major proclaimed as "good ... for Europe, and a good agreement for the United Kingdom."—[Official Report, 11 December 1991; Vol. 200, c. 862.]

The Leader of the Opposition and most of the existing shadow Cabinet, including the shadow Foreign Secretary, trooped into the Lobby in support of Maastricht, proclaiming it as a great triumph of European diplomacy. The shadow Foreign Secretary made a wonderful speech in favour of Maastricht—he did not just skulk into the Lobby following the Whip—in which he was even moved to say:

"I do not want to find myself in a country that is outside a European superstate, with our industries unable to penetrate it."—[Official Report, 4 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 343.]

It is a complicated sentence, but essentially he was saying that on balance he was in favour of a superstate—which, let me say, I am not—rather than against it.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman is adept at switching his position backwards and forwards. We have debated this issue a number of times. I recall—I am sure that he has forgotten—that back on 11 December 2002, I asked him to refresh the House's memory about whether he had voted on the Maastricht treaty itself and on the issue of a referendum? At column 307, I said:

"am I right in thinking that he voted against a referendum on Maastricht?"

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said:

"The Secretary of State might remember that I was out of the House at the time of the treaty."

That is very careful wording, because he may have been out of the House at the time of the treaty, but for sure he was in the House when it came to be considered. He was suffering from the most extraordinary amnesia, because I pressed him again and he said:

"I do not recall a vote on a referendum."—[Official Report, 11 December 2002; Vol. 396, c. 307.]

This was the key and critical issue facing the Conservative party, splitting it apart, and he could not remember whether he was in favour of or against a referendum, even though he had spoken against it.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: No. It is important that the right hon. and learned Gentleman learn a bit from this. Finally, when I produced the voting list, which has his name on it, he owned up and pleaded guilty to having voted against a referendum on Maastricht. By God, it was difficult to get him to own up to the truth. The truth is that he has always been a closet pro-European. The reason he is so unconvincing today is that neither his heart nor his brain is in the task that he is having to undertake.

Mr. Ancram: The Foreign Secretary has accused me of being a closet pro-European. I wonder what he is. Let us look at his election address—not from 1983, when we know he had to be loyal, but from 1979. We were told:

"Jack Straw was against Britain's entry to the Market and has campaigned ever since against its nonsenses."

Is that the Foreign Secretary's position today?

Mr. Straw: No, but it was my position then. I have been very straightforward about this. Moreover, I do not suffer from amnesia. I am perfectly willing and ready, and always have been, to explain the position that I took. After all, it was entirely public. I was active in the no campaign in 1975.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman needs to think about the position into which he is trying to push the Conservative party. He was appalling, even by his own standards, when answering questions put by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe

(Mr. Clarke). What his right hon. and learned Friend was asking—and what will be asked right up to the election and throughout it—is, "What is the Conservative party's policy in respect of the European Union?"

We know what the Conservative party's policy is in respect of this draft treaty, but let us say that for some reason it did not become European law. That is perfectly possible, although I do not know what the odds are. Let us say that we were left with the existing treaties—the treaty of Rome, the Single European Act, Maastricht, Nice and Amsterdam. Would the Conservatives accept them or not? Most of what they are objecting to today is not in the new constitutional treaty. Most of the provisions to which they object so violently were negotiated by them in 1972.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman starts rabbiting on to me about the clause relating to mutual solidarity and loyalty. That is a lift from article 11 of the Maastricht treaty, which states:

"The Member States shall support the Union's external and security policy actively and unreservedly in a spirit of loyalty and mutual solidarity."

The right hon. and learned Gentleman signed up to that. Is he going to tell the country that he will tear all that up? What process will he employ? How will he deliver on a promise that is easy to make but impossible to fulfil, on the common fisheries policy? He will certainly not deliver on it if he tears up this constitution. The right hon. and learned Gentleman does not have an answer to that.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: No, I want to make some progress.

I said that there were four questions, but there is a fifth, which defies adequate explanation. It concerns the position of the Conservative party. As we know, it is now led by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), his support for Maastricht notwithstanding. He is leading the party towards an anti-European view, which underlines a profoundly defeatist view of Britain's position in the world. Beneath that lies a sense, based on the Conservatives' experience of the Major Government, that Britain lacks influence and will be unable to punch its weight in any international forum, including the European Union.

The leader of the Conservative party is now calling for a referendum on this treaty. He said before that there had to be a referendum on the Amsterdam treaty, because it was "an unacceptable step towards an integrated federal superstate".

I have looked at the Amsterdam treaty again, and I cannot see for the life of me what caused such a fuss. What is it about the treaty that the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes thinks will lead us towards an integrated federal superstate? He does not know, although he keeps quoting it. The leader of his party said that Amsterdam would lead the way towards an integrated federal superstate. Can he name just two or three items in that treaty that would lead the way towards an integrated federal superstate? He cannot name one.

There is one thing in the Amsterdam treaty that the right hon. and learned Gentleman might have begun to support, if Conservative Members had even bothered to read it before coming out with this nonsense. The Leader of the Opposition talks of supporting a more flexible Europe, in which groups of countries can come together and do their own thing without necessarily having an impact on other countries. That was in the Amsterdam treaty. It is called flexible co-operation. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman welcome it or reject it? Every time a treaty has been produced since we came to power—though never before it—the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his leader have said that it will take us towards a superstate. Subsequently, however, it becomes apparent that we are nowhere near a superstate, which rather undermines the right hon. and learned Gentleman's judgment today.

I gather that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) is half back in favour with Conservative Front Benchers. He said of Nice that "the proposed . . . treaty would do what Guy Fawkes failed to do—blow up parliamentary government in Britain".

Several years have passed since the Nice treaty came into force, and parliamentary Government seems to me to be alive and well in Britain. Indeed, the Conservative party is making use of it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Straw: I shall give way in a few moments. Contrary to the myths peddled by Conservative Members, no superstate has appeared: Britain maintains its seat of the UN Security Council; NATO remains the cornerstone of European territorial defence; and Her Majesty the Queen remains our Head of State.

Mr. Shepherd: The Foreign Secretary's parliamentary sidestepping is one thing, but the truth is that the people who should be asked about the Amsterdam, Maastricht, Nice and other treaties are the British public, who have never been consulted. That is the crucial question that lies before the House today.

Mr. Straw: At least the hon. Gentleman is being consistent—[Interruption.] I know that he has consistently argued for a referendum, and may I say that my party is the only one ever to have provided a referendum on the EU, back in 1975? The hon. Gentleman can make his point, but the Conservative Front Benchers cannot. The issue now is not the aggregation of the treaties, but whether or not we have a referendum on this specific constitution if it becomes law.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Notwithstanding the sins of the Conservative party—signing up, among other things, to the common fisheries policy—is there not a wider issue concerning the disconnection of the wider public on European issues? Would not a referendum be a good way of closing and ending that disconnection? In that context, is the Foreign Secretary aware that there is a Bill before the Scottish Parliament to legislate for a consultative referendum on the constitution? Would it not be odd to have a vote north of the border—I would, of course, welcome that—but deny the voters of England, Wales and Northern Ireland their say on such an important matter?

Mr. Straw: I understand the hon. Gentleman's case, which has been made by several other Members who support the draft and our membership of the EU. In our current judgment, it is better to scrutinise it here.

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Straw: I shall give way one last time.

Mr. Cash: The Foreign Secretary has repeatedly stated that this is no more than an accumulation of treaties. Does he not accept that the final provisions of the proposed constitutional treaty state that all those treaties will be revoked, but reapplied without prejudice to the acquis communautaire, so they will fall within the legal framework of the new constitution, which is quite a different thing?

Mr. Straw: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, I have never said that it is just an accumulation of treaties. I said rather that it is a consolidation of existing treaties, which partly changes the decision-making process and partly provides for new powers. We need to examine it in each particular respect. I do not subscribe to the Conservative view that we should exaggerate the effect of the draft treaty, but equally I have never sought to minimise it. What we need is a straightforward debate. On any analysis, however, I do say that it involves less significant change than either the Maastricht treaty or the Single European Act. I believe that that is absolutely the case.

Even on the role of European Court of Justice in respect of common foreign and security policy, article III-282 states clearly:

"The Court of Justice shall not have jurisdiction with respect to Articles I-39 and I-40"— they are the paving provisions for foreign, security and defence policy—

"and the provisions of Chapter II of Title V of Part III concerning the common foreign and security policy."

So everything that relates to common foreign and security policy, with some tiny exceptions, is excluded under that provision.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: No; I want to make progress and there are others who want to get in.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory rose—

Mr. Straw: All right—I shall give way one last time.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am grateful, but it is pure sophistry on the part of the Foreign Secretary, who ought to know what is in the draft constitution, to deny that the European Court of Justice will have jurisdiction over the whole of article 15, which binds member states to giving active and unreserved support to the common foreign and security policy

"in a spirit of loyalty and mutual solidarity".

If a state strays from that obligation, it will therefore be breaking the constitution, and that question will be decided not by this House but by the European Court of Justice. That is what the constitution clearly says, and no amount of talk about paving clauses or other articles can alter that fact.

Can we get back to some honesty and clarity in this debate, and stop the Foreign Secretary trying to pretend that the constitution contains elements which it does not, and that it lacks elements which it does in fact contain?

Mr. Straw: I should tell the right hon. Gentleman, as he calms down, that I understand the point he makes. I raised it during the intergovernmental conference, and with the legal experts who work for the Council, not the Commission. Their counter-argument is that there is no need to exelude the jurisdiction of the ECJ under article 15 because it has no jurisdiction under that article. Its jurisdiction only arises operationally, under chapter 2 of part 3, and after examining this issue in immense detail I am satisfied that that is so. If I can be convinced that we are wrong—by just slightly better lawyers than the right hon. Gentleman—we will reconsider the charge, but there is no issue of principle here. What we need is a mature debate. Rather than creating the myth that this provision will lead to the ECJ's telling the House whether or not we should be loyal to the European Union, or that we should take a different view in respect of Iraq—such things could never happen—we should apply ourselves to the text and recognise that much of the wording on the common security and defence policy was first included in the draft not by the Convention, but by those who drafted Maastricht.

Lady Hermon rose—

Mr. Straw: I am going to close. The myths about the constitution leading to a European superstate are now the stock in trade for today's Conservatives, who would put British jobs, British trade and British influence at risk by marginalising this country within Europe. This is the clear political divide on Europe: between a party of isolation and weakness, and a Government who are getting on with the job of reforming the structures of an enlarged Union, so that it can better deliver on the issues that matter to people. In the light of cross-border threats and of the chance to develop a market with which we do half our trade, the idea that Britain should withdraw into splendid isolation and detachment from the European Union is frankly absurd. We need to engage in Europe to make it more effective at dealing with common threats, and more effective at delivering the jobs and growth that people want.

We are negotiating a treaty that, if satisfactorily concluded, will help Europe better to deliver on these issues. The treaty sets out clearly the framework of an effective Europe of nation states. It acts only where its member states have conferred power upon it, and it is able to function more efficiently. Parliament has already been involved in this process to an unprecedented degree, and it will be for Parliament to decide whether the treaty becomes part of British law. I therefore urge the House to oppose the motion and to support the amendment.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): I doubt very much whether a single vote will be changed as a result of these proceedings, or whether any hearts and minds will be significantly changed either. In a sense, these debates, which have almost become part of parliamentary punctuation, have enabled Members to restate cases that have been stated with varying degrees of eloquence for some time—at least since the constitution was first mooted.

I still have some difficulty with the question of the primacy of European law. I raised this point with the shadow Foreign Secretary, who has another engagement and has apologised for his absence. If such primacy was part of the jurisprudence of the European Community from 1964 onwards, inevitably, by virtue of our accession in 1972, we must be taken as having accepted it. I find it difficult to understand that a distinction is to be drawn as far as the application of that primacy is concerned simply because a document will be produced that asserts it once again.

The only way to look at this properly is to put oneself in the position of a domestic judge. Today, a domestic judge faced with an issue to which European Union law is relevant is obliged to apply that law. The day after a constitution or treaty was ratified by this House, that judge would be in precisely the same position as he is today. It seems to me that a wholly artificial distinction is being drawn.

My right hon. and hon. Friends will vote for this motion. We do so for reasons that I hope to explain in a moment or two, but I want to make the point that we have consistently argued that a test has to be applied when any question arises of a change in the nature of the relationship between Westminster and Brussels. Looking again, as I did in preparation for this debate, at that test as we have set it out on previous occasions, I freely accept, as I hope others will, that tests of this nature are inevitably subjective; they can never be empirical.

The test that we have set out on previous occasions is that if the provisions that the Government eventually bring before the House involve any major shift of control, any transfer of significant powers from member states to European institutions or any alteration to the balance between member states and those institutions, a referendum will be necessary. The Foreign Secretary argues that those criteria are not fulfilled. However, a document such as that which failed to achieve agreement in Rome would necessarily trigger a referendum because in our judgment it would meet the criteria that my right hon. and hon. Friends have set out.

Mr. Cash: As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, I have great respect for many of his views on this subject, but does he accept that the House of Lords report to which I have already referred says explicitly in the context of the European Communities Act 1972:

"In short, Parliament did not hand over a blank cheque, legally or politically. The Government should set out their view on the Kompetenz-Kompetenz question clearly to Parliament and to citizens in the UK."?

Does that not imply that it is essential not only that the Government should set out their views but that they should put the matter beyond all doubt by introducing domestic legislation that would ensure that our judges gave effect, if necessary, to clear and unambiguous law inconsistent with the 1972 Act?

Sir Menzies Campbell: The hon. Gentleman put that point to the Foreign Secretary. In the interests of brevity, I simply adopt the Foreign Secretary's response and ask the hon. Gentleman to put himself in the position of a judge today and a judge the day after a document of the kind that we have been discussing had finally been ratified by the House.

We do not have such final proposals before us today; nor inevitably could we have them. However, we are entitled to assume that what is likely to emerge from the process into which the Irish have put additional force and life is likely to bear substantial similarity in substance to the previous proposals that formed the basis of the discussion in Rome. It is my judgment—I accept that it is a matter of judgment—that the proposals raise constitutional implications that it would be right to put to the people of the United Kingdom. I say that as a matter of law, but also as a matter of politics. One of the features of the debate about Europe and our relationship with Europe is the extent to which we—the people of the United Kingdom—have become disconnected. One of the ways in which that connection could more effectively be restored is to give people the opportunity to endorse what is a very substantial change.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that any new treaty will be subject to close parliamentary scrutiny? If we then had a yes-no referendum on whether to endorse it, he—like me—would no doubt campaign for a yes vote, if the treaty emerges in the form that seems likely. A yes vote would be a clear endorsement, but what would a no vote mean? We cannot anticipate the result, but it appears that a no vote would be interpreted as giving a mandate for a blank cheque to negotiate further changes to the existing treaty, the Single European Act, the Maastricht treaty and the treaty of accession, and even to reopen the issue of the primacy of European law. If a no vote could be interpreted in that way by those who are demanding a referendum—notably, the right-wing press—would not it be a dangerous further step to take after comprehensive parliamentary scrutiny, which has been regarded as adequate on all previous occasions?

Sir Menzies Campbell: I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will not seek to visit the sins of his Front-Bench colleagues on me. The point that he made to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) was not answered with quite the cohesive intellectual response that one would expect from a prominent member of the Scottish Bar. On 1 May, we will admit the new member states without any constitutional change, under the existing arrangements enshrined in the treaty of Nice. When the proceedings on the constitution became becalmed, I suspected that all we would have needed was 18 months of trying to live under the arrangements in the Nice treaty and there would have been a clamour for a constitution, because of the sclerosis that would undoubtedly have occurred and the inability of the European Union to operate in the absence of a constitutional document of the kind that we are discussing. I do not seek to reopen any of the previous treaties, but I accept the Foreign Secretary's point that in many respects they are opaque and difficult to understand. It is often difficult to find the details of particular competences, which require substantial searching. The argument in favour of a constitution that sets down clearly the competences—and the extent to which they are restricted to Brussels or domestic Parliaments—is essential.

Mr. Shepherd: The sincerity of the Liberal Democrats on referendums on such matters is not in question. Indeed, Paddy Ashdown sought a referendum at an early stage of the Maastricht process and he supported a private Member's Bill on the issue. However, it cannot be enough to say at each stage of the constitutional changes, "We are for a referendum", and then when no referendum takes place, say that the matter is closed. The argument relating to a referendum on this new measure is that in a sense it is reopening the position that the Liberal Democrats took—that a referendum was appropriate on Maastricht.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I see it not as reopening those issues, but as an effort to consolidate them. The hon. Gentleman is right about consistency. My recollection is that Mr. Bryan Gould, who was then a Member of Parliament, introduced a new clause during the Maastricht debates that would have required a referendum to be held on the issue, and the Liberal Democrats voted for it.

In 1995, we had a rare Liberal Democrat Opposition day that resulted in the motion that we had tabled being passed. The motion argued that if there was a material change in the relationship between the United Kingdom and the European Union, such change should be ratified and endorsed by a referendum. Not all those who now argue either for or against a referendum found time to vote on that occasion. The result was something like 33–0, which was a considerable victory for us, but the occasion did not command, I am sorry to say, much parliamentary support.

The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) referred to Paddy Ashdown, who was the first of all the party leaders to say that entry to the single currency involved not only economic considerations but constitutional and political implications and that therefore there should be a referendum on it. That is now the view of almost all Members.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I do not think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has adequately answered the question put by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) about what would happen if the British people voted no in a referendum. What would be the position and how would we proceed?

Sir Menzies Campbell: It would be deeply damaging to the European cause; it would be foolish to do other than admit that. We cannot refrain from giving people the opportunity to pass judgment on issues of that kind, if we believe that is the right thing to do, simply because we are concerned about the outcome. I hope that my confidence is not misplaced, but I am confident that such a referendum can be won. Indeed, it most certainly will be won; the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) and I certainly spend enough time going around the country arguing the case.

The case should be argued and the referendum can be won. Indeed, if I had a complaint about Members on the Treasury Bench, it would be that there has been reticence about arguing the case for Europe. To some extent, that has been overtaken by the enthusiasm that the Prime Minister displayed yesterday during his report of the EU summit that he had just attended.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Redwood: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Menzies Campbell: No, I want to make progress. I have been generous in giving way, and although I am not subject to the time limit on speeches I do not want to trespass unnecessarily on Back Benchers' time.

Those in favour of a constitution for Europe should be prepared to argue their case in order to reconnect the individual electors of this country with the EU. There is a large amount of shadow boxing in these matters. Foreign policy, defence and taxation are red-line issues for the whole House and exchanges designed to suggest that the Government are somehow willing to make concessions on them are artificial. Those matters are the quintessential responsibility of this Parliament; it is notable that they have not been devolved to Wales or to Scotland.

Earlier, I said that the existing treaty system is opaque. It certainly needs clarity and the purpose of the constitution is to set down and define the role and powers of the institutions of the European Union. As I have already said, we will be able to admit the accession states on 1 May; it is not constitutionally necessary to have the proposed constitution but it is politically essential.

As I have said before, we must bring an end to the constant tinkering with the constitutional arrangements of the European Union. We cannot continue to conduct the affairs of the EU as if we were engaged in a perpetual Maoist cultural revolution. When we consider what things have been like under the existing membership, we can imagine how difficult they are likely to be when there are 25 members. That culture has too often been characterised by last-minute compromise, set against a background of physical exhaustion and horse-trading.

Mr. MacShane: Like the Liberal party conference.

Sir Menzies Campbell: If only.

My support arises from my unabashed enthusiasm for the European Union, which dates back to the 1975 referendum campaign when I shared platforms for the yes campaign with such distinguished parliamentarians as Lord Whitelaw, Brian Walden and Lord James Douglas-Hamilton. The yes campaign was very distinguished—even aristocratic. I believe firmly that, as the Prime Minister and his predecessor have said, Britain should be at the heart of Europe.

As I have said before, I believe that Britain should be a member of the single European currency. I believe in an effective common foreign and security policy, which is what Maastricht envisaged. Indeed, Maastricht went on to envisage the possibility of a common defence—something that is not much talked about these days, but it most certainly was in the treaty. A constitution of the type proposed will be entirely advantageous not only to Europe but to us, too.

The background for that is my overwhelming belief in the need for co-operation with our European partners. Let me take the illustration of international terrorism. Does anyone really believe that we can achieve success in that campaign, unless there is much more co-operation than we have previously experienced? The exchange of intelligence and the movement of individuals and money all require co-operation with our European partners. How would we make environmental advances, unless we do so co-operatively?

Lady Hermon: I am extremely grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for taking an intervention. I have waited patiently for him to address the fundamental rights aspect of the constitution, and it would be enormously helpful to those of us who have some doubts about the wisdom of the European constitution if he would do so. I raise that issue in particular because he mentioned the supremacy of community law at the beginning his speech. Of course he will be aware that five years' work has gone ahead in Northern Ireland to produce a Bill of Rights for Northern Ireland. Bearing in mind that the provisions on fundamental rights in the constitution will also have supremacy, have we all been going through the razzmatazz in Northern Ireland needlessly on a Bill of Rights?

Sir Menzies Campbell: I would hesitate to suggest that razzmatazz in Northern Ireland had been needless. The hon. Lady, who is an expert in the field, knows much more about it than I do. Of course the charter of fundamental rights supplements and, in some respects, adds to the European convention on human rights, but the convention is one to which we have always been a signatory. The change that occurred when the Government came to power was to pass legislation that allowed British citizens the right to invoke the provisions of the convention and to seek to vindicate their rights under that convention in British domestic courts, without having to go Strasbourg.

The fact that the fundamental rights have now been introduced seems to be one of those constitutional implications to which I have previously referred. The charter introduces something new and not something for which the Government had a mandate, given their manifesto. So my answer to the hon. Lady must be that I do not purport to pass judgment on the position in Northern Ireland, but I most certainly believe that the European convention on human rights and the charter raise, as a consequence of the charter in particular, some fundamental questions of a constitutional nature, hence justifying the argument—in my view, in part at least—for a referendum.

On a number of occasions, I have talked about the need to reconnect the citizen with the European Union. Hardly a day goes by when we do not open our newspapers to find dire predictions about the number of people who are likely to vote in the next general election to the House, but how many people are likely to vote in the European elections, no matter how vigorous the campaign might be? That will be a measure of the extent to which Europe is not seen as something of significant importance in the lives of many people. That is why I argue that a referendum on the issues with which we are concerned today, allowing the British people the opportunity to pass judgment and to endorse what is proposed, would be entirely in their interests and in ours as well, so I have no doubt that the opportunity offered by a referendum is one that should not be passed up.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind all right hon. and hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 10-minute time limit on Back-Bench speeches.

5.49 pm

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): I take as my opening text the Prime Minister's words when he spoke at the Labour party conference a couple of years ago:

"We're at our best when at our boldest."

It seems that this is an opportunity for the Government to be bold, to take the risk and the chance to trust the people. We are also currently engaged in an exercise called the big conversation, and we have an opportunity to have a conversation with the British people that will result in a conclusion—a vote at the end if we go down the road of a referendum. This opportunity should not be missed, because I fear very much that the big conversation is being driven by the ideas of those American political theorists, Simon and Garfunkel, who in their seminal text, "The Boxer", said:

"Still a man hears what he wants to hear

And disregards the rest".

The only opinions that will be listened to are those that fit what is already acceptable. However, an open-ended decision to hold a referendum and to be bound by the result would galvanise political opinion in Britain.

The suggestion that line-by-line political scrutiny by the House would be sufficient misses the point about the disconnection between the political process and the people in the country. Endless hours in which lawyers quibble over details that are fascinating to them is not the same as forcing the British people to make a decision that we, who see ourselves as their political masters in many ways—regrettably in my view—would agree to be bound by. That opportunity should not be missed.

[Mr. Ian Davidson]

To those who ask what no means, I would have thought that no in a referendum clearly means that we will not accept what is being offered. Those who suggest that this would be a problem only for Britain are missing the point. A no by any country that is given the opportunity in any way to ratify the constitution and declines to do so means that the constitution has to go into the melting pot. If the Portuguese decide to vote it down, it will not be a problem solely for the Portuguese, and it will not be a solely British problem if we decide to vote it down. It will be a problem for all those who are gathered together to debate how matters should be progressed. We must reject completely the assumption that we cannot have a referendum in case we come out with what the Government would see as the wrong decision that leaves us isolated in Europe. We must recognise that other countries are prepared to trust their peoples. Why are we not prepared to trust ours?

Mr. MacShane: Let us follow my hon. Friend's train of thought. If there is a no vote and the Government bring back a new treaty, will there be a second referendum—and a third and a fourth?

Mr. Davidson: That is an interesting point. I remind the Minister of what happened in Ireland when the people had the temerity to turn down a treaty. They were then obliged under international pressure to hold another referendum. If the Government tell us that they are willing to hold a second referendum if the people vote no in the first one and they then make substantial changes to the treaty, I would support them in those circumstances. I would be willing to support a second referendum if the first referendum resulted in rejection of the constitution. The assumption is again being made that we are the only people who might turn the constitution down. If other people reject it and we have a completely new constitution, it seems fair that the people should have the opportunity to make a further decision.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that, in the two instances in which there has been a second referendum, the outrageous situation emerged in which the rules were changed in respect of financing, advertising and the rest of it? In the case of the Irish referendum, that occurred on 24 December when most good Irishmen were in the pubs.

Mr. Davidson: I certainly hope that the Government in this country would have sufficient integrity not to seek to change the rules for a second referendum should we get to that stage. That would be outrageous. We would need to pay attention to how much both sides spent and we would have to consider whether the allegedly impartial information provided by the Electoral Commission and others was, in fact, impartial. None the less, the pattern of the referendum should not then be changed.

I want to raise with the Minister the issue of how people will express their views. I want to avoid a situation in which the European elections or the general election are seen as referendums on the European constitution. Issues relating to Europe—as we know from the Conservative party—can split parties. A substantial minority of Labour Members favour a referendum and would wish to oppose the constitution as it is currently put forward in such a referendum. People should not have to choose in such a way given that there are two cross-cutting cleavages and we have the opportunity to park the European issue in a referendum so that a decision can be made on it separately from the European or general elections.

Lest the Minister be in any doubt about the scale of pubic opinion in his party, I tell him that opinion polls conducted among the major trade unions affiliated to the Labour party show that 81 per cent. of Unison members polled, 78 per cent. of Amicus members, 88 per cent. of Transport and General Workers Union members and 80 per cent. of GMB members favour a referendum. It is clear that those who speak up on the matter are not necessarily in the majority, but as the Minister knows, expressing dissent from the Government's view on anything is not necessarily a career-enhancing move. Several people would prefer to wait until a later stage before expressing their view. All that the minority of Labour Members have is the people, the arguments and the capitalist press, and that combination managed to cause a fair amount of damage on the question of the euro. I notice that those who were on the losing side—the Government side—during the euro debate are exactly the same people who are against a referendum and in favour of ramming through the creation of a European superstate.

In the debate that we are having tonight, and the one that will go on, I hope that people will not revert to citing the smears and distortions that we often hear from spinmeisters in the Government, especially the accusation that those of us who are against the Government proposal to ram through the measure without a referendum are simply little Englanders. I might be little, but I plead not guilty to the other charge. A number of us are linking up with "Democracy International", which is a multinational campaign to try to achieve referendums throughout the European Union. I hope that the Government recognise that the argument for referendums on such an important issue is widespread throughout the European Union, and that they appreciate that those of us who argue for referendums in this country and elsewhere in the European Union are doing so in the spirit of internationalism.

I also hope that the Government will refrain from arguing that those of us who are in favour of a referendum and against the new constitution are automatically in favour of withdrawing from the European Union. To the best of my knowledge, no Labour Member who argues in favour of a referendum is in favour of withdrawing from the European Union. Repeating that accusation, even though it is repeatedly denied, is a deliberate attempt to distort the terms of the debate. The Minister is not a stupid man. Indeed, he is a bright man and, on occasions, a pleasant man. He has bought me libations on several occasions—perhaps too seldom to recall them all just now. I hope that he will intervene on his perhaps less fastidious colleagues to ensure that that accusation is not repeated.

I have touched on the question of what will happen if the constitution is rejected. That will be a problem not only for us, but for Europe. If the constitution is rejected by several European states, the problem will be much more collective than would otherwise have been the case.

I regret the opportunistic way in which what happened in Madrid and elsewhere is advanced as an argument in favour of the accretion of more powers at the centre. How can we possibly trust those in the European Union who are incapable of stopping thieves and vagabonds robbing the common agricultural policy blind to police against terror in the EU? It is clear that before there is any further accretion of powers to the EU, it must put its own house in order. The British Government have made insufficient efforts to reform the way in which the EU operates, to increase the financial probity of the schemes it runs, or to examine the value for money obtained, for example, in foreign aid programmes. Before we give the EU more money to spend, we should ensure that it uses the powers and assets that it has better.

We must remember that we in Parliament have power as a result of the votes of the people. The referendum is important. At a time when there is severe dislocation between those who govern and those who are governed, we have an opportunity to give the people a choice. We should do so.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): The constitution is the most important measure that I have faced in my 20 years as a Member of Parliament, and which the House has faced since this country entered the European Economic Community in 1973. However, the Prime Minister's sole preoccupation is to get it through quickly.

I respect those—we have heard some of them speak in this short debate—who argue for a highly integrated Europe with a single structure, a new legal order, a permanent President, a Foreign Minister and extensive new powers over immigration, criminal justice and the economies of member states. I do not agree with them, but I can at least debate with them. I have no respect whatever for those who deny the epic importance of what the House is now considering—who refer to it as "a tidying-up exercise". The cure for that is simply to read the constitution in its draft form.

The draft constitution defines and limits the powers of member states probably better and more extensively than those of the European institutions. It is just as much a written constitution for this country as it is for Europe, and we in this country have not had a written constitution since Cromwell briefly introduced one following the civil war. There is a massive transfer upwards of powers to the new Union. That fact is inescapable—it is written on almost every page of the draft.

We have again debated the primacy clause today, and the Government have again claimed that article 10 simply repeats what is in treaty law. It does not do that. There is nothing in existing European treaties about the primacy of the European Court of Justice or of those treaties over national laws. It is a convention that has been established in the case law of the European Court of Justice that where directives and regulations conflict with national laws, those directives and regulations shall prevail, but on those foundations the draft constitution erects an unqualified assertion of the primacy of the constitution and all the laws flowing from it over the laws of member states.

Mr. Hendrick: If, as the right hon. Gentleman says, the draft is some sort of integrationist plot, will he tell me why the Conservative party is happy for there to be a President of the European Commission and a President of the European Parliament, yet, in terms of the Heads of Government, unhappy for there to be a President of the Council?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Oh yes, we are creating a Europe of presidents all right. I can add to that. There will be a president of the European Court of Justice, a president of the European Central Bank, a permanent President of the Council, a President of the Commission and a President of the European Parliament. It is a presidents' plot, if it is a plot at all. It is not a people's Europe that we are developing—it is a politicians Europe with jobs for more politicians. If that is the Europe that the hon. Gentleman wants, he has it in the draft.

The point that I was making, which has not been contradicted from those on the Government Front Bench, is that the primacy clause, article 10, will extend far further than anything in the existing treaties. It will implement the same primacy over the intergovernmental pillars—that is, justice and home affairs, and the common foreign and security policy—for the first time. It is not just the laws of the new Union that will have primacy, but the constitution itself—that is, the obligations in the constitution—the solidarity obligation on member states and the entire EU charter of fundamental rights. That takes up the whole of part II of the constitution. The charter of fundamental rights—all of it—will therefore have primacy over the laws of member states.

In his remarks, the Foreign Secretary claimed that there was a House of Lords report that showed that there is a shift from the Commission to member states. It would have been less disingenuous of him if he had not told us that that report came out long before the end of the Convention—before the Convention even defined or debated the powers of the Commission. So if anyone is peddling myths in this debate, it is the Foreign Secretary.

It has been asserted that the constitution will be simpler than the treaties. It is, in fact, longer than the treaties that it replaces. It has been claimed that it will bring clarity to the division of power between member states and the new Union, but most policy areas will be shared. There is no other constitution in the world that defines all the policies to be shared. What is the definition of sharing? When the Union legislates, member states will have to leave that area of policy entirely to the new Union. I hope that none of us have to share a flat with someone whose definition of sharing is that when they move into the flat, we have to move out. That is the definition written in the draft constitution and it is not under review. It is not a red line issue for the Government.

Criminal justice, perhaps, gives us the best overall example of what is at stake. There are 21 completely new articles covering justice and home affairs in the draft constitution. They cover the definition of serious crimes and the penalties that will attach to them in general areas such as corruption, computer crime and organised crime. All that will be harmonised and decided by the Union by majority voting. The same is true of criminal procedures, rules of evidence and the rights of the accused. All these things will be decided by majority voting.

The Minister for Europe tabled an amendment in the Convention disagreeing with that in unequivocal terms. I give him credit for that, at least. He said that it is essential that the relevant article is rejected in its present form and made subject to unanimity if it survives. Why, then, do the Government now say that they have so-called wriggle room in respect of the criminal justice procedures? Those go to the heart of what the House is about. We have just had a Criminal Justice Bill going through the House that attempted to define and, in some cases, limit court proceedings and the rights of the accused. It is the essence of democracy that such matters are debated here where we are answerable to our constituents and ultimately to an electorate. All that goes upwards to the new Union.

Mr. Cash: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if we simply put into our criminal justice Bill the words "notwithstanding the European Communities Act 1972" and followed that with what we wanted, we would be able to achieve our objectives?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: With his ingenious Bill, which I have signed, my hon. Friend would go a long way towards establishing a bulwark against the new constitution. I wish him well with that, but it forms no part of the Government's case in the forthcoming negotiation. The irony is that the entire exercise was supposed to be not about writing a new constitution—that is alluded to only at the end of the instructions given to the convention—but about bringing democracy to Europe. That means bringing Europe closer to its citizens. That was the instruction given to us. How does it bring Europe closer to the citizen to take more decisions away from member states, away from the people and upwards to the most remote tier of Government of all in Europe? That is why this is in essence a democratic issue.

In my view, this is not only wrong, it is dangerous. It breeds alienation and despair, and ultimately extremism, if decisions that should be taken here about the coercive power of the state, about imprisoning people, about our foreign policy and about the conduct of our economic and employment policies, are taken away from the Chamber, which is answerable to an identified electorate, and given to a Union that is beyond any sort of democratic control.

There is only one solution and that is to ask the people. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) that that is not merely an option, it is essential. The Government have no mandate for this European constitution. I have a copy of the relevant part of the Labour party's manifesto on which it stood at the last election. There is nothing whatever in it about a European constitution. That differs from the Maastricht treaty, which featured prominently in the Conservative manifesto of 1992. In any event, we shall have a referendum about Maastricht when and if the Government make up their mind about the big issue of Maastricht, which is the European currency, the euro. As I have said, there is nothing in the manifesto, on which the Labour party won the last election, about a new European constitution. That is why we need to ask the people.

If the Government are right, and conceivably they could persuade the people that this is only a modest consolidating measure of no great consequence compared with weighty issues—such as whether Hartlepool should have a mayor, or whether Sedgefield, I think that that is the next one, will decide whether it will have a mayor—let them have the confidence to advance that argument and win that argument. That is, if they really can persuade the people that this European constitution is of no great importance. I will put my case, and that of my right hon. and hon. Friends, to the arbitration of the British people.

Let us remind ourselves that the opening words of this constitution are about reflecting the will of the citizens and states of Europe. How do the Government know that it reflects the will of the citizens of Europe without asking them? It would be an outrage if the Government were to bounce this issue through a supine House of Commons in which they have a temporary majority and take us into a binding written constitution for the first time in our history without asking the people for their consent. That is why federalists and those who want an integrated Europe joined forces with us in a common endeavour to ask the people, to trust the people, and to get a vote on the issue this year.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). I listened with great care to what he said. He confused a series of concepts. The idea of having a referendum for a mayor is a local issue and entirely separate from a national issue as to whether there should be a referendum on joining a European constitution. In the United States they have many referendums on, for example, whether people want a supermarket. That is not the same as a national referendum on a national issue, which would lie within the heart of this Parliament.

One of the earliest stories that I learned many years ago was that a senior figure, Lloyd George, brought in a younger man called Harold Macmillan. Harold Macmillan asked him what was the essence of a good speech. Lloyd George said that it was to choose one's themes and to stay with them. I will do that in the time that is available to me.

My first theme is that of ever-closer union. The right hon. Member for Wells referred to the people, the citizens of the European Union. The citizens of the European Union benefit from free trade and the single market because the Single European Act was signed in 1986 under Lady Thatcher's leadership. They benefit from the sense of security, because the continent was ravaged by wars for 1,000 years.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): That is because of NATO.

Sir Stuart Bell: I will come to NATO in a moment, and it is part of my theme—I am always grateful for sedentary interventions by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

We will discuss the global war on terrorism, but EU citizens have those two major benefits, which bring the citizens of Europe closer to the concept of the European Union. The concept of the ever-closer union was adopted by Sir Edward Heath way back in 1972, when we signed up to it for the first time. We moved closer when we signed the Single European Act; we moved closer still when we signed the Maastricht treaty; and we will go closer again when the European Union moves eastwards and grows to 25 states—as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said, it may grow to 27 states. That is the ever-closer union that we are debating tonight.

In this debate, I have been struck by how the House of Commons has suddenly become a Chamber for barristers. Perhaps that is because the Foreign Secretary and the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) are barristers.

Mr. Forth: What are you?

Sir Stuart Bell: I shall make my confession in a moment. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) is a QC, and I must humbly admit that I, too, am a barrister. However, I will not dwell on the legality of the debate. We have examined clauses, interstices in Lords reports, article 12 and article 13A—I almost stood up and asked what article 15 says in the hope that someone would give me an answer. The debate is not about the pernickety points of the various articles in such a huge constitutional document; it is about the principle of ever-closer union and whether it should be put to the test of a referendum.

When I listened to the right hon. Member for Wells I was struck by the reversal of Conservative policy. Over the past century, Conservative party policy was to win an election, govern the country and, after four to five years, to return to the country, render an account and seek a further mandate. What has happened to that principle? The only time that principle slipped was on the Maastricht treaty, when, in order to keep the Tory party together, the Prime Minister at the time offered a referendum on the single currency. The only time that a Conservative Government have ever offered a referendum was on joining the single currency, and the only reason for that was to keep the Conservative party together.

I shall make another confession, since I have made one already: in opposition, I would never have agreed to a Labour Government having a referendum on a single currency. I take the single currency not as a constitutional matter, not as a matter of profound significance to our country, but simply as completing the architecture of the single market, which Lady Thatcher introduced in 1986.

Mr. Hendrick: Does my hon. Friend agree that we are watching an Opposition tactic? Because they cannot win votes in the House, they are trying to persuade the wider public, with the help of certain friends in the media, in order to obtain a no result. Hon. Members such as the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) want not only a no vote from the country in a referendum on this issue, but to unravel the Amsterdam treaty, the Nice treaty, the Maastricht treaty and earlier treaties, which were agreed by previous Conservative Governments.

Sir Stuart Bell: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. We are seeing opposition for the sake of opposition. Everybody who watched the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes could see the great difficulty in which he found himself, which happened because he does not believe in the argument.

On opposition for opposition's sake, I sympathise with the Opposition because day in, day out we sat through the debates on the Maastricht treaty. I remember coming into this Chamber in daylight and going out next morning in daylight, never having seen the evening.

Andrew Selous: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that political power is given to this House by the British people at the time of a general election and that that power is not ours to give away to any other body without the express consent of our electorate?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing me to my third theme—leadership. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Minister for Europe is in his place, because with his French background he, too, will remember Alexandre Auguste Ledru-Rollin. He is nodding, of course, because he has read his history books. In 1848, that gentleman was the leader of a faction that stormed the National Assembly. Afterwards, he was found at the very back of the crowd, and someone said, "What are you doing? You're their leader." He replied, "Yes, I am their leader. That's why I'm here at the back—I'm following them." We saw from the leadership of the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes that he was following the crowd behind him. That is in the interests of neither the Conservative party nor the country.

My fourth theme is NATO, which the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst mentioned from a sedentary position. A significant event took place yesterday, when seven new nations from the east joined NATO and added to the sense of security to which my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary referred. NATO is responsible for our territorial defence; it is equally responsible for those other countries and for the European Union as a whole.

So, as Europe moves into this new century, we have the security of NATO, ever-closer union, the free market, and stability and prosperity the likes of which have never been seen before. We have to decide whether we will do our constitutional duty by debating this ever-closer union in this Chamber, taking into account the views of our new-found barrack-room lawyer friends on both sides of the House.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) is still in his place, because he and I have debated many issues. Sometimes we are on the same side of the fence, as on first past the post as opposed to proportional representation, but we found ourselves on different sides on the single currency. I should like to refute a comment that he made earlier. Those who support the single currency have not lost any battle. We regret the fact that a referendum did not take place early in 1997, but it will take place eventually when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has set down the most rigorous conditions for entry and has twice said that we have not met them, agrees that that has happened. The battle is not lost: my hon. Friend and I will meet again on this economic battlefield.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): It is important that we have a referendum on the single currency. I wish that we had already done so, because the people would have had their say, almost certainly to vote no overwhelmingly. The hon. Gentleman says that this constitutional issue should be debated in this Chamber. That is true, but why not debate it in the country as well? Why does he not trust the people to debate the very serious issue of how we are to be governed in future and let them have a say in a referendum?

Sir Stuart Bell: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. I respond by saying that the day must come when the bridge between civil society and political society is cleared of the distortions of the media; then we can have a proper, genuine debate on a whole host of issues. We know full well that those debates cannot be held on equal or neutral terrain.

Let me make another point to those who claim that a referendum is in the interest of this country. In 1969, when General de Gaulle held a referendum on regional assemblies and reform of the Senate, it was converted into a debate about whether people wanted him to stay in power. It is therefore not sensible to hold a mid-term referendum on such an important issue. I make a distinction between local referendums, which the right hon. Member for Wells mentioned, and a national matter, which falls back to the Chamber. We are elected; we have a mandate. The people—our constituents—expect us to do their work for them and make a decision in the interests of our country.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the House's conducting of a debate through the Standing Committee on the Convention on the Future of Europe is exemplary, and that a similar mechanism is needed to discuss the draft treaty and then the treaty?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. The Foreign Secretary made it clear that the treaty is a constitutional treaty, which will be fully debated. The debate will be long and we may spend many a night rather than many a day here. However, the House is the place in which to hold the debate. We can have knowledge, information and a free flow of ideas, and ultimately the House will decide. At the next election, the country will follow that decision.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): Many Labour supporters, especially old Labour supporters, must be distressed to find that, when the glorious day in 1997 was repeated at the subsequent election, they elected a Bourbon Government. "L'état c'est moi"—what I say must go; I do not want to hear the views of others.

The struggle has been long. It was almost inconceivable in 1970 that we were on the threshold of constructing a new system of government that grants rights beyond the call of the British people. That is what we are considering—who is sovereign. The Labour party struggled to expand the vote because it knew that, through gaining seats and a majority here, it could establish what the law is and shall be. It could set wrongs right and look backwards and forwards. That glorious struggle formed part of our modern constitution. Today, we hear arguments that all that counts for nothing and that the House is sovereign.

I believe, however, that our modern constitution was declared at the turn of the last century by the new Labour party of the day. It declared that the people were sovereign and that the House was the means whereby that sovereignty was expressed. We send elected representatives here—they are here today and gone tomorrow. We may change them and by changing them, we change our law: the law that can send us to prison and the law that can make us free. Through that law and this institution, we protect and preserve our liberty. This place is about that essential trust.

Yet the Government say that they can redesign the constitution because they understand its essential vulnerability. It is not entrenched and no constitutional court secures it. That is why we have witnessed the mashing of the conventions that made our constitution work. The brave, new, Bourbon Labour Government say that they will sweep away the principle that no Parliament may bind its successor. In the past 30 years, the people of Britain have understood but a glimmer of that. The process of European integration and the new judicial and legal system have never received the direct attestation and consent of the people who sent us here. That is the heart of the matter. The sovereignty of Parliament is the sovereignty of the people. And when Labour Members are asked by their constituents, "Why don't you change the law to prevent the export of live horse meat to the continent?", the brave new Bourbon Labour Government say, "Oh no, it's not for us. We've given that power away." By what authority have they done so? By the transient authority of a temporary Government that in time will give way to another Government, which in time will give way to another Government.

The continuing constitutional necessity of this country is to ensure that the people are sovereign. The denial of the proposition that the people may make a judgment on any of the Acts that have removed power from their Government and the jurisdiction of their courts is wholly to be opposed. We will fight, and there are millions out there who are no longer prepared to tolerate the nonsense that goes on under the protestations of these Bourbons, who say, "It is a matter for us, but once we have cast our view, we want it to be immutable." Nothing in this world is immutable.

Mr. Hendrick: Is the hon. Gentleman making a case for no trans-national legislation whatever? If so, can he tell the House how pollution can be persuaded to stay within national borders, or, as the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) put it, how fish can be persuaded on which side of a line in the sea to stay?

Mr. Shepherd: This Bourbon must return to his constituency and assure those poor, benighted people whom he represents why their views do not matter.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) went to the heart of this debate with a question about the national health service, to which the Foreign Secretary replied that there would be a constitutional crisis. That is what we are reduced to—the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, having allegedly read the treaty, saying, "In the event that they do something that goes to the heart of what we stand for, we will have a constitutional crisis." It is not good enough.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is making a powerful and important speech. Does he agree that the Foreign Secretary's argument that because a few powers were given away under a previous treaty it is all right to give all the rest away under this constitution is a falsehood? Is that not analogous to my ordering a pint of beer, drinking a quarter of it, and the Foreign Secretary coming along, drinking the rest, and saying, "It serves you right, because you wanted the glass empty"? That is what this Government are doing to our pint of beer.

Mr. Shepherd: I am lifted by my right hon. Friend's contribution.

Let us consider the sophistry of the Bourbon Front Bench which purports to represent the national interest no less but will not allow anyone else to look over their shoulder to say, "We do not want this," or "We do want that." The concept that the Government set themselves—the test that was high—was that a Government in their maturity seek the consent of the people, not merely their acquiescence. This dire Government are satisfied at best with acquiescence and never go for consent.

The expression of consent on this measure, as has been pointed out by the Liberal Democrats, does much more for the body politic than this stonewalling. It would lend dignity to the Government if they would accept the proposition that these matters are profound, and that the constituents whom we temporarily represent cannot lose their inalienable right to determine who shall govern this country.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): On 1 May, the whole House will celebrate the enlargement of the EU from 15 to 25 member states, a process ratified unanimously in this place. This enlargement process, however, could have been achieved by a simple accession treaty, which everybody in the House would have supported. Instead, this wonderful historic moment on 1 May will be overshadowed by the controversy surrounding the proposed constitution, with all its attendant baggage, which has nothing whatever to do with the enlargement, as the Prime Minister has in effect conceded.

The Laeken summit called for the simplification of EU treaties, for more openness and transparency, and for an attempt to reconnect the peoples of Europe with EU institutions. At the time, stirring speeches identifying the need to address the democratic deficit were made by the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the then Minister for Europe. Yet—here I echo the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory)—no one in their wildest imaginings would believe that simplification, openness, transparency and reconnection characterised the constitutional package that is likely to be agreed in 12 weeks' time; quite the reverse.

This constitution was idiotically described by the former Europe Minister as a tidying-up exercise, and even more absurdly described as a constitution no more important than a golf club's, which would fit into a jacket pocket. Those were the words of the Foreign Secretary. In fact, the constitution is riven with contradiction and ambiguity—a veritable beanfeast for lawyers. In no way does it give the people of Europe any more control over EU institutions, or any enhanced level of accountability.

Tellingly, most of the constitution was opposed at different stages by the British Government, but then meekly accepted. Virtually nothing in the constitutional package bears the stamp of British influence; but what is most shameful is—once again—the truly terrible lack of leadership by Britain in the European Union. Britain has always been carried along in the slipstream of others, always—in this respect—wrongly and pathetically trying to secure influence by giving in on the constitution itself, the charter of fundamental rights, the single legal entity, the new Foreign Minister and the diplomatic service.

What is the result? Ten years ago, 72 per cent. of EU citizens saw their country's membership as a good thing. Today, less than half of them do. In Britain, only 29 per cent. do. The dangerous disillusionment grows, and by no stretch of the imagination will this constitution deal with it.

The key question is simply this: why do we need a constitution? It is a question that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and I have posed both in the House and to so many of our European partners, but we have never received a satisfactory answer. The constitution has nothing to do with enlargement, it does not increase accessibility, and its hundreds of pages are the reverse of simplicity.

The Foreign Secretary knows perfectly well that there is no real and universal enthusiasm for this constitution. The technical elements for enlargement were agreed at Nice. Everyone agrees that, in essence, that could be enough. Everyone knows that the gulf between the elites of Europe and the people is growing, and that turnouts will no doubt be down again in the European elections. So why do the Government not speak out against a constitution to which they were originally opposed? It is like the emperor's new clothes. If the Government could just once in our relationship with the EU—even at this stage—say no, others would be only too pleased to agree.

Why do the Government not do that? They lack the principled courage that would enable them to do it. That is entirely characteristic of a Government whose failure to show leadership ill serves the British people, and who have not managed to secure the return of a single power either to this Parliament or to the people of this country since they came to office.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): The Foreign Secretary spoke at length about the balance of the relationship between member states and Brussels. He never once chose to mention the relationship between the governed and the governing—the citizen and the state. Does my hon. Friend share my deep concern about that?

Mr. Spring: I entirely agree. That is at the heart of the Government's attitude to the British people on this key matter.

Let me say this to the Minister. As we have seen in other countries, influence in the EU arises because member states pursue and protect their national interests vigorously and with determination. This constitution could have been strangled at birth if the British Government had insisted.

The devil is in the detail. We know from the ambiguity that surrounds the text that the unwelcome EU jurisprudence will spread in our national life. We need only read the House of Lords European Union Committee report on the future role of the European Court of Justice to see that. It envisages a considerable extension of the powers of the European Court of Justice, which will become the new constitutional court and the new supreme court for the Union. It is the self-same European Court that has repeatedly forced forward an integrationist agenda.

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. Friend share my understanding that most Government areas become shared with the EU, and that "shared" means that it tells us what to do?

Mr. Spring: Exactly, a shared competence is one that has evolved from the European Union. It was notable in an earlier debate that the Foreign Secretary did not even know the definition of a shared competence. It is typical of Ministers to diminish themselves in the eyes of their European counterparts by interpreting EU decisions here in a way that would be laughed out of court everywhere else.

The truth of the matter is that six EU countries will be having referendums – and quite possibly the Czech Republic and Poland, too. Others may follow. I challenge the Government to let us have a proper, open and transparent debate and to let the nation hear us argue our corners. The way to achieve that is through a referendum campaign. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson), who said that being in favour of a referendum does not mean being in favour of withdrawal. The Government's suggestion that it does is entirely incorrect.

When the Foreign Secretary was Home Secretary in 1998, he spoke about an electoral system for elections to Westminster. He said:

"Confidence in our political system has been significantly eroded in recent years. Our challenge is to restore confidence in our democracy, to bring decision-making closer to those who are affected by decisions, and to restore trust in the way in which we are governed. That is why we have embarked on a major programme of change."

He also said:

"Voters, not politicians, should have the final say . . . Whether there is change or no change, the referendum will provide the popular legitimacy that is essential for our working democracy. It is the British people's right to have that say, and our responsibility to provide it."—[Official Report, 2 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 190–01.]

That was what our Foreign Secretary said in this Chamber when he was Home Secretary in 1998.

Some will be in favour of the constitutional package before us, and I respect their democratic right of opinion, but we take a different view. What unites so many across the party political divide is a clear recognition that this is of constitutional significance. If the good burghers of Hartlepool are allowed a referendum, so should be the voters of the United Kingdom. In that regard, it might be of interest to hear what the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) said in a speech in Berlin in March 1998:

"It may be that the era of pure representative democracy is coming slowly to an end. Today, people want to be more involved. Tony Blair's Government has already held two referendums and three more are at some stage in prospect, not to mention more citizens' movements . . . Democracy and legitimacy need constant renewal. They need to be redefined with each generation . . . This requires a different style of politics"; and he went on to talk about the necessity of involvement via the internet and referendums. He continued:

"People have no time for a style of government that talks down to them and takes them for granted."

I could not have put it better myself.

The Government have sponsored dozens of referendums to legitimise change since 1997, but when we are confronted with the first written constitution in our history, suddenly every excuse is offered. Interestingly enough, Nigel Smith, who successfully led the yes campaign for Scottish devolution, recently described the same issue as follows:

"Consciously or unconsciously, through the use of referendums Tony Blair has completely changed the constitutional landscape in this country. Up until this point, whenever it has contemplated a constitutional change—nationally, regionally or even locally—this Government has rightly sought the specific endorsement of the people affected in a referendum. It is therefore deeply worrying to observe the inconsistency with which Ministers have approached the question of the proposed EU Constitution. This has naturally changed the expectations of the voters.

For those of us who believe in referendums, the draft Constitution—whenever it comes—presents a classic case for initiating a national debate, followed by a binding vote for the people, all the people."

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) talked about the sovereignty of Parliament and of the people of this country; such sovereignty is at the heart of the democratic process. To deny that this step is of constitutional significance is entirely wrong, and simply widens the gulf that exists between the people of this country and government. Frankly, what is good enough for the people of Ireland, Portugal, the Netherlands and many other countries is certainly good enough for us. Our people are becoming increasingly alienated from the political process and we cannot afford to alienate them further. I invite the Government to think again and to do what is absolutely right: to give the people of this country a choice on a vital matter that affects our future.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Denis MacShane): We have had an enjoyable debate, even if some of it has consisted of a re-run of speeches that we have heard for some time. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) said that Ministers should make the case for Europe. I try to do my modest best—probably not with sufficient success—but I wish that he, too, would occasionally make the case for Europe, instead of constantly making the Daily Mail case for a referendum. Yet again—I address my remarks specifically to him—we have had an essay on form, not substance. I want to talk about the important issues that Europe faces, and the important need to secure a constitutional treaty that brings together the elements of the existing constitution.

Of course, we do indeed already have a constitution for Europe. It can be found in the existing treaties, and it talks about ever-closer union—a phrase that will be removed under the proposed draft.

In my view, that constitution gives excessive power to the President of the Commission. The proposed draft will counterbalance that power with a new authority for the nation states of Europe, which are united through their Council of Ministers and their new standing chairman. My one small contribution to British diplomatic parlance was to persuade my Foreign Office colleagues to start describing that gentleman as the "standing chair" of the Council. In some other European languages, the word is the same as "President"; however, that term clarifies the situation.

Mr. Redwood rose

Andrew Selous rose

Mr. MacShane: To whom shall I give way? Let us have age before future.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to the Minister. We have had no referendum on the euro because the Government know that they would lose, and we have not been offered a referendum on the constitution because they know they would be slaughtered. Trade unionists and Labour voters, as well as Conservatives, would love to vote this disgraceful treaty down.

Mr. MacShane: As a rugby union fan, I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that we would win. I shall come to the important question of why the gravediggers of parliamentary democracy, many of whom we have heard from today, should not get their way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) has always taken a consistent position on Europe. He opposes the euro.

Mr. Ian Davidson indicated assent.

Mr. MacShane: He opposes European defence procedures.

Mr. Davidson indicated dissent.

Mr. MacShane: I am not quite sure where he stands on other issues. He invited me to park the question of the constitution, but as a Minister it is not my job to park anything. I want to see a functioning and effective Europe.

The right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory)—

Mr. Davidson rose—

Mr. MacShane: My hon. Friend gave way to me, so I must reciprocate.

Mr. Davidson: I have always made it absolutely clear that I was not opposed to the euro in all circumstances, but that now and in the immediately foreseeable future it would be economically illiterate for us to join. I am not opposed to European defence; indeed, in that regard I am more European than the Government. I also took the European view on Iraq, so I do not accept for a moment the Minister's suggestion that I am anti-European.

Mr. MacShane: The majority of EU member states were in favour of intervention in Iraq. It is a debate that we perhaps need to have at another time.

The right hon. Member for Wells made his traditional passionate attack on Europe, but I have to put myself at times in the place of citizens elsewhere in the world. The notion that somehow the French and German constitutions would be abolished by this new European superstate simply is not an argument that can be advanced. Poland and Hungary believe that their sovereignty has been enhanced by joining the EU, even if the right hon. Member for Wells went and campaigned in Poland to stop the Poles from voting yes to joining Europe. The right hon. Gentleman was honest. He was not arguing for a referendum as a point of principle about how we would consult the British people. He wants a referendum campaign to say no. Other hon. Members who intervened in the debate, even if they did not make speeches, have taken consistent positions of relenting hostility to our membership of the European Union.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell), on the contrary, spoke in favour of Britain staying in Europe. He made a speech that I do not have time to make this evening. All our recent debates have been focused on form and the question of the constitution, not on the substance—what we need to do to make Europe a success and ensure that Britain works effectively in our national interest within the European Union.

The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) made the shortest speech of the debate and for that reason a very effective one, if I may say so. I think that he spoke passionately—I hope that I do him no disservice in saying that—in favour of Britain leaving the EU. He talked about the Bourbons incessantly. I thought that the definition of a Bourbon king was not "L'état c'est moi"—that was a bit ahead of their time—but those who had learned nothing and forgotten nothing. I gently put to the hon. Gentleman as a passionate parliamentarian that that is very much the position of his Front-Bench team today. My party took the same point of view almost exactly 20 years ago. We have learned from that experience. I gently suggest that if the Conservative party wants to be taken seriously as a party of government, it too has to start learning the truth that it would be a disaster for the British people to continue this ranting against membership of the European Union.

Mr. Cash: The Minister refers to the national interest. How does he equate the national interest with undermining the sovereignty of the United Kingdom Parliament, and does he not agree that the House of Lords report to which I have referred, which I am sure he has read, clearly states that there is a fundamental change in the nature of the relationship between member states and the EU in respect of the matter of competence and many other matters that go with it.

Mr. MacShane: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has allowed me to make a slight diversion from my speech and refer to the conclusions of the excellent House of Lords European Union Committee, which have just been published. In paragraph 157 it says:

"We welcome the fact that Article I-10(1) makes clear that primacy only applies to the Constitution and to Union law that has been adopted in the exercise of competences assigned to the Union's institutions."

In other words, the European Court of Justice is exactly the court that defines what the EU does.

Mr. Cash: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. MacShane: No, if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me. Paragraph 161 states clearly—

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister—inadvertently, I am sure—is misleading the House. He quoted paragraph 157 of the report. It clearly goes on to say:

"There remains some uncertainty as to the scope of application of the principle."

In paragraph 158, it says:

"More clarity is needed to address these two concerns".

Mr. Speaker: That seems to be a matter of debate.

Mr. MacShane: I am happy to take another intervention from the hon. Gentleman, but paragraph 161 says:

"The draft Treaty reaffirms and strengthens the position of the national courts".

We could have a debate about what is in the constitutional treaty. I argue that the authority of the national institutions of Europe—those that the people of Poland and the Czech Republic have so bravely won in recent years—is upheld under the terms of this draft treaty. But we are not allowed to have that discussion. Instead we are having a discussion about whether to have a referendum.

I am a defender of the House of Commons. I was elected 10 years ago and I love this place. It has been good to me and I cannot think of any greater honour for any citizen of this country, especially one such as me, whose parents did not come from here, than to sit in the House of Commons. Therefore, it is extraordinary to me that it is proposed that this House should tonight casually throw away its supreme duty to be the guardian of the interests of the British people and surrender itself to the populist plebiscites of the Rothermere press.

The Liberal Democrats' position is even odder. I can understand why the Conservatives, with their obsessive dislike of Europe, want to command headlines in the anti-European press. But I do not understand why the Liberal Democrats, the Scottish Nationalists and the Ulster Unionists also wish to join the tribe of monkeys on the organs of the Rothermere press. Let us not forget that the Liberal Democrat party is composed of two halves. We know where the Liberals came from, but the other half was a breakaway from the Labour party on the exact issue of the incessant clamour for a referendum to take us out of Europe in the early 1980s. I know from conversations with Liberal Democrat MEPs and Members in the other place that they are distressed that the party has given new lustre to the opportunism of the main Opposition party in supporting this incessant clamour for a plebiscite.

I am a great fan of Edmund Burke, who argued that Britain should be governed by people with "long views". When the Conservative party was led by Churchill, Macmillan and Margaret Thatcher—in her early days—there were times when it took the long view that it was in Britain's vital interest to be in Europe and to help to run Europe. Today, the Conservatives' idea of Burke's long view is anything that fits into a Daily Mail headline.

Burke also liked Parliament because it was where we, the elected representatives, could express our views freely

"even though against a predominant and fashionable opinion."

I know that the predominant and fashionable opinion in London in much of the press is hostile to Europe. I am happy to nail my colours to this Dispatch Box and say that I am passionately pro-European, and I invite all

hon. Members who believe that our country's interests can never lie in adopting the isolationist policies of the Opposition to vote against the motion this evening.

I also agree with Bagehot when he wrote that

"the distinguishing quality of Parliamentary government is, that in each stage of a public transaction there is discussion: that the public assists at this discussion; that it can, through Parliament, turn out an administration which is not doing as it likes, and can put in an administration which will do as it likes."

I invite the Opposition to remain anti-European, to continue to speak against active and involved membership of the European Union and to deny the necessity for making the Union of 25 work by supporting a new rule book in this new constitutional treaty, which will take us forward. The longer the Conservatives remain anti-European, the longer they will stay in opposition.

Over the years, this nation has signed solemn treaties such as the ones joining the World Trade Organisation, which removed powers from this House over commerce, and NATO, which removed powers from this House over defence policy. We have shared sovereignty to grow and add value to what we do. The European Union is part of that process.

I invite the House tonight to uphold parliamentary democracy. I invite the House to say yes to Europe. I invite the House to reject the anti-European and anti-parliamentary nonsense of the Conservative party.

Question put. That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the intensified scrutiny of both Houses in respect of the draft Constitutional Treaty; believes that the Government's policy of active engagement within the EU is in Britain's national interests; supports its constructive approach to discussions within the Intergovernmental Conference to ensure that an enlarged Union works effectively; endorses paragraph 66 of the White Paper (Cm 5934) in respect of issues which must remain the province of the nation state; notes that provided there is a satisfactory outcome on these and other matters of concern, the proposals currently being discussed would not alter the fundamental constitutional relationship between the member states and the Union and therefore does not believe there is reason to depart from previous practice for constitutional treaties; and reaffirms the primacy of Parliament to decide on whether any future Constitutional Treaty should become part of UK law.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No.15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr. Peter Hain relating to Sittings of the House and consideration of any Lords Message that may be received may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Paul Clark.]

European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Bill

Lords Reasons for insisting on an amendment to which the Commons have disagreed, considered, pursuant to Order [8 March].

Clause 1

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I beg to move, That this House insists in its disagreement to Lords amendment 1F to Commons amendment 1C, but proposes an amendment in lieu thereof.

The House of Commons continues to believe that four regions must be included in the Bill, and that these regions should be the north-east, the east midlands, Yorkshire and the north-west. Earlier this afternoon, the House of Lords voted by a narrow margin to yet again prevent convenient all-postal voting in the north-west of England. Their Lordships voted by only 136 to 130 votes to drop the north-west from the proposals put by the Government and the House of Commons.

It is worth noting that the majority of Cross-Bench peers voting this afternoon voted with the Government against the peculiar alliance between the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives. Interestingly, there is a majority among life peers in favour of keeping the north-west in a list of four regions. The Government were defeated on that occasion by the votes of the hereditary peers.

Let us not forget that the House of Commons has voted for four regions on four separate occasions already—on 8 March, 16 March, 24 March and yesterday, 29 March. Four times the House has expressed its view. There is no doubt about the decision by elected Members of Parliament.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): The Minister continues to speak of the House of Commons, without recognising the fact that he is speaking about only his own party. As I have pointed out to him, independent commentators have said that important matters concerning elections, such as this, should be agreed between the parties. The Government should not involve the other place in a battle when there is no all-party consensus on what they are trying to ram through.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman clearly has a different understanding of our democracy if he thinks that we should have unanimity among all parties on all matters. The House of Commons makes its decisions on the basis of the majority of votes. We are accountable to our constituents for the decisions that we make, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The House of Lords has powers to revise and amend, which it often uses with authority and experience. On the Bill, we have listened to many of the Lords' concerns. We have conceded, for example, on the declaration of identity, which some of my hon. Friends will remember. We have allowed that provision to be in the Bill, so it is not the case that we have been unwilling to listen or to revise the Bill. The time has come for the House of Commons to make sure that it can assert its view, and we have decided to ensure that all four regions have the opportunity of all-postal voting in June.

[Mr. Leslie]

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Is it not peculiar that the Conservative party is enunciating a new doctrine, whereby the will of the House of Commons should not prevail if only the government party emphasises that will? In view of the fact that the Conservative party railroaded the Single European Act through on a guillotine and the poll tax through with only its support, when did that new constitutional doctrine arise? The Conservative spokesman who advocates the new doctrine may want to go to the House of Lords pretty soon himself.

Mr. Leslie: It would be somewhat cruel to exacerbate the Conservative spokesman's difficulties on the latter point, but it is odd that the Conservative party has scraped the barrel to the extent that it is resorting to requesting unanimity on such issues. The Conservative spokesman feels that that is the way to proceed, but the majority of elected hon. Members in this House disagree with him, and quite right too.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): In a previous debate in which the democratic House was attempting to have a democratic say on how we run our democracy, I asked my hon. Friend the Minister to speculate on why both main Opposition parties seem hellbent on making it as inconvenient as possible to vote. Has he had a chance during the intervening period to speculate further on why we are experiencing such resistance from those who may be afraid of high turnouts?

Mr. Leslie: The fear of high turnouts may well be a reason for the resistance. The alliance between the Conservative party and the Liberal Democrats is peculiar. The phrase "liberal democracy" rings hollow when one thinks that the Liberal Democrats are happy to use and abuse the powers of the other place. Although the Liberal Democrat party is a minority party in this House, it wants to abuse the majority power in the other place to thwart the view of the democratically elected majority in this place.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): If one examines the Chamber this evening, the majority of Labour Members represent constituencies in the north-west, whereas few, if any, Opposition Members who represent constituencies in the north-west are present. We want to maximise turnout in the election to enable as many people as possible to vote, and we therefore support the inclusion of the north-west in the pilots.

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is right, and he knows that he is accountable to his constituents for the decisions that he takes. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) is one of the few remaining north-west Opposition Members on the Back Benches, and he may speak for the Conservatives in the north-west, but I hope that he recognises that we are entering uncharted constitutional waters.

Today, the exchanges between both Houses have matched the current record for disagreements, and if peers in the other place were to resist the fifth decision by the Commons, they would overturn the will of the elected House in a completely unprecedented way, taking our constitution into uncharted waters in a manner not seen since detailed records began after the second world war. Can the hon. Gentleman justify the other place's abuse of its powers?

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The Minister says that 130 peers supported the Government in the vote in the House of Lords. Can he tell me how many Labour peers and how many Cross-Bench peers are in the House of Lords? If this is uncharted constitutional territory, the least the Labour Whips in the Lords could do is get their troops out.

Mr. Leslie: An awful lot of Conservative peers did not vote in the Division in the other place. It is interesting that the vote is becoming closer and closer as they realise that their argument for overturning this House of Commons becomes weaker and weaker. The time has now come for the other place and Opposition Members to recognise that they have tested the boundaries of revision and amendment to their limits. Their activities are becoming obstructive and vexatious. I hope that the House will now recognise that the issues are immensely simple. This is a matter of judgment as to which regions we pick to pilot all-postal voting in the June elections. We feel, and this House of Commons believes, that four regions are best.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): May I make a suggestion to the Minister that is genuinely intended to be helpful? Vote stealing is a very serious offence from which we in Northern Ireland have suffered for generations. To their credit, this Government introduced the Electoral Fraud (Northern Ireland) Act 2002, a wonderful piece of legislation that was taken through, to the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland, by the Minister for Work, the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. Browne). That Act included specific identifiers to eradicate fraud in relation to postal voting. Will the Minister take it away—I will give him my copy—to see whether he can engage in some joined-up thinking with the Northern Ireland Office to reassure those of us who are genuinely concerned about postal voting giving rise to fraud that the identifiers that were used so successfully in Northern Ireland could be used in the north of England?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Lady makes a constructive offer: I will certainly take her copy from her after the debate. We have already made several changes to the Bill to improve our ability to counter fraud and malpractice. Our amendment not only reasserts that four regions are best, but helps to bolster still further the anti-fraud measures in the Bill by specifying that the declaration of identity accompanying the ballot paper must advise the voter that the ballot paper should be completed outside the presence of any other person, or, in the case of voters who require assistance—for example, those with visual impairment—only in accordance with the advice that we will provide to returning officers. Yet again, the amendment improves anti-fraud measures. It underlines our determination to combat malpractice, reiterates our belief in the secrecy of the private act of casting a vote, and supplements the myriad anti-fraud measures that we have already put in place.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): This has nothing to do with fraud, as we have been given no evidence whatsoever that fraud will increase as a result of postal voting, nor any details of prosecutions arising from the alleged fraud that we are told about. Does my hon. Friend agree that this is more to do with saving the skins of Liverpool Liberal Democrat councillors than the democratic process?

Mr. Leslie: I cannot fathom why the Opposition parties have joined together in this strange way—we can only speculate on their motives. I now feel very strongly that all-postal voting is no more prone to fraudulence than conventional voting. We have been given no evidence for that—for example, a record of more convictions having occurred under all-postal voting in the pilots that have taken place than occurred under the conventional arrangements. Opposition Members have been grasping at straws to find reasons to oppose making voting more convenient. We want to make voting easier because we know that there are difficulties with turnout, particularly in local and European elections, and we are simply proposing that we find a way to ensure that we improve engagement in our democratic process. That is why we picked the four regions.

Mr. Kaufman: I am sorry to disturb my hon. Friend again. One can completely respect the views advanced by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). However, although the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats talk about the potential for fraud, the Lords reasons say nothing whatever about it. What is more, the Lords reasons changed all the time. When the provision was sent back to us two weeks ago, the Lords reason for rejecting it was "Because is appropriate to make provision for no more than two pilot regions, as recommended by the Electoral Commission."

However, their reason for doing so today is

"Because it is appropriate to pilot postal voting in three rather than four regions."

The House of Lords is equalling the Liberal Democrats' hypocrisy—that is a massive achievement.

7.45 pm

Mr. Leslie: As usual, my right hon. Friend has his eye on the detail. He is right that fraud did not appear in the reasons on this occasion. We have been reasonable with the other place and responded to their worries about fraud and malpractice. We have bent over backwards to make changes to the Bill, including the concession that has disappointed many of my hon. Friends. They are disappointed about the inclusion of the declaration of identity to be a witness to the signature. The Electoral Commission advised that we should move towards a single signature arrangement. However, we made the concession, which proves that we have tried our best to listen to some of the more reasonable objections from the other place.

Mr. Hawkins rose—

Mr. Leslie: The partisan decision of Opposition parties to persist with preventing the House of Commons from having its way is ridiculous, and the hon. Gentleman's words will probably prove that.

Mr. Hawkins: The Minister suggests that there is no evidence of a risk of fraud. However, he has often been reminded by me and other hon. Members of the Electoral Reform Society's views about the Bill. It has repeatedly said to all hon. Members who are involved that the risk of large-scale fraud now exists for the first time in more than 100 years.

Since we are considering clarity, will the Minister respond to the challenge that I have issued three times to the Government to publish all the letters that the Deputy Prime Minister and other Ministers sent to the Electoral Commission? We have seen the Electoral Commission's letters but we have not seen the Deputy Prime Minister's threatening letters. Will the Minister publish them?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman will find letters from the Government to the Electoral Commission in the Library. I am sure that he will be delighted to read them. He is grasping at straws because he simply cites the views of others rather than producing hard evidence of malpractice. Has he offered the House details of prosecutions and convictions? Where is the hard evidence? He has anecdote, hearsay and allegations but no evidence that all-postal voting is any more prone to fraudulence than conventional arrangements. We have dealt firmly and completely with the argument about fraud.

The arguments are now focusing on what the public prefer. They want the opportunity for all-postal voting. They clearly expressed that by voting in greater numbers in places where we piloted the scheme in local elections. We have the resources for four regions to do that. We know that the regional returning officers desperately want all-postal voting and that they want a decision to be made now. They would face a considerable challenge if the Conservative and Liberal Democrat alliance forced them to go back on their preparations, find the polling stations in the new ward boundaries that the boundary changes have created and recruit the staff to conduct the elections. It would be a considerable challenge if the north-west were forced to revert to a conventional arrangement. I hope that Conservative Members and Liberal Democrat Members will reconsider and reflect on the fact that the House—reasonably but determinedly—wants to ensure that four regions are included in the Bill.

Important principles are at stake. Of course, there is a wider question about the elected House of Commons making decisions. However, it is also important that, having thoroughly examined all the aspects of the Bill and made concessions when necessary, we have the opportunity to take forward the decision that the provision for four regions is right. I hope that hon. Members will agree that it is time to settle the matter.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Leslie: No, it is now time to make a decision and insist on our disagreement with the Lords amendment.

Mr. Hawkins: The Minister still does not recognise the fatal weakness in the Government's case, which is that as recently as 16 December, on this same Bill, the Government said not once or twice but many times that they only intended there to be three pilot regions. As we know, the Electoral Commission originally recommended only two. The Government said that they intended to bring forward plans for a third, and they said it not once but many times. Then, suddenly, out of the blue, only five days after this Minister said that he intended to bring forward plans for a third region, they announced that they wanted there to be four. They wanted the whole of England north of the Trent to be chosen, and, for their partisan party political reasons, all of the areas that face referendums later on regional government. That is why the Deputy Prime Minister has been so obsessed by this matter.

The Government have had the benefit of the advice of their Electoral Commission—they set it up. As my noble Friend Baroness Hanham said:

"The Opposition did not set up the Electoral Commission—the Government did. They had a long report from it, part of which said that it thought that it would be suitable for two European electoral regions to be part of the electoral pilot".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 March 2004; Vol. 659, c. 856.]

We have had this debate many times. This is about round eight of the contest. One thing has changed, which is that the Government are finding it difficult to get their own peers out to support their policy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) pointed out, with the decreased majority in the other place, had the Government managed to get all the Labour peers to vote earlier, the result might have been different. I understand that it is difficult for the Government to get their own peers to support much of their policy, not just on this Bill but on many other matters. If the Government's problem is not so much the battle between the two Houses but their whipping in the other place, that really is serious.

Mr. Watts: Can the hon. Gentleman clarify what the Opposition's position is on this issue? He seems to be saying that the Electoral Commission should decide which election system should be used in each election. If that is the case, he seems to be overriding the responsibility of the House of Commons to make the final decision. Can he clarify why he believes that it is acceptable to run a pilot in the north-west for regional government, but it is not acceptable to use it for the European Parliament and local elections?

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman is making the same sort of mistake that the Minister made a few moments ago. He is talking about the Electoral Commission's recommendations as if the Electoral Commission had not given compelling reasons in its report, repeated by the chairman of the Electoral Commission as recently as in his letter of 24 March, as to why its concerns about the north-west remain strong. The Government set up the Electoral Commission. They are saying in terms, several times, as we debated last night, that their views about the north-west have not changed.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is again repeating something that is not in the Electoral Commission's report, as he and other Opposition Members did yesterday. Let me quote to him the executive summary of the Electoral Commission's report on this issue—[Interruption.] He should just listen to this:

"We believe that there are a number of other regions which could potentially be suitable for conducting an all-postal pilot scheme."

Where in that quote does the commission rule out an all-postal pilot in the north-west?

Mr. Hawkins: May I quote again to the hon. Gentleman, as I did yesterday, —he obviously was not listening—the letter from the chairman of the Electoral Commission, Mr. Sam Younger:

"The considerations as set out in our December report regarding the north-west have not changed. For the reasons set out in my letter of 4 March, we are not persuaded of the merits of piloting in four regions."

All that the other place is doing is sticking to what the Electoral Commission says—turning down the north-west, and keeping to three regions, not four.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman is not standing up tonight to say that he wants to stick to what the Electoral Commission recommended, according to his version of what it recommended. That was the position two weeks ago, but the House of Lords has sent back this amendment saying that it is appropriate to have three tests. How can he shift now? Well, I know how—it is because that argument has been snatched away from him, just as his seat is about to be snatched away from him.

Mr. Hawkins: The right hon. Gentleman clearly has not been following every stage of the procedure. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) pointed out, the Bill has been amended since the earlier stage.

We have sought, in another place, to be reasonable with the Government. We have offered them what the right hon. Gentleman's own Minister was putting forward as recently as 16 December in debates on the Bill. At that time the Government were saying—not once, not twice, but many times—that they wanted three regions. It is the right hon. Gentleman's party that has changed its preference from three regions to four, and that is one of the reasons why the other place is so determined to stick to its view.

Andy Burnham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hawkins: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman one last time.

Andy Burnham: The hon. Gentleman and I have sat through debates on the Bill on a number of occasions.

On each occasion, he has made great play of allegations of fraud in the north-west. I told him yesterday that Lancashire constabulary had said there was no evidence of wrongdoing in the very elections to which he had alluded. In fact one allegation of fraud is outstanding in the north-west—against a Liberal Democrat in a traditional ballot. Where now is the hon. Gentleman's argument against an all-postal ballot in the north-west?

Mr. Hawkins: As I told the hon. Gentleman yesterday, if he wants evidence he need only read the speeches of Lord Greaves, an expert on elections. His views are set out in great detail.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hawkins: But an even stronger point is that, having expressed its fears, the Electoral Commission—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Members seeking to intervene must not remain standing for any length of time if the hon. Gentleman is clearly not going to give way.

Mr. Hawkins: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

I was responding to the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham). The Electoral Commission expressed its fear that any allegations that might be proceeded with might coincide with the elections. As recently as 23 March, the commission has said that those considerations have not changed. The hon. Gentleman does not have to agree with its judgment; all I am saying is that I do.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): As the hon. Gentleman is a lawyer, he should perhaps reflect on what he has said. He suggested that speeches by Lord Greaves constituted evidence. How on earth can that be so?

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman may not agree with Lord Greaves, who represents a different party in another place. I have simply said that I have read the noble Lord's speeches, and they strike me as a pretty compelling argument. The fact that the hon. Gentleman does not agree with them does not mean that his judgment is any better than the noble Lord's.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I have listened to the debate, and while there are good and sound arguments on both sides, does my hon. Friend not think that it is the action of a knave to deride opinions held sincerely by people who disagree with those arguments? Some Conservative Members who have fought many elections believe that merely making voting more convenient is not the way to generate a greater and more genuine interest in politics. Does my hon. Friend not agree that a more genuine interest in politics is very much part of this argument?

Mr. Hawkins: I entirely understand my hon. Friend's point. What I particularly object to is the attitude of Labour Members who, if they do not agree with an argument, seek to deride it rather than listening to it and considering it in a mature way.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): If, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) has said, there are no outstanding cases of electoral fraud in the north-west as a result of postal ballots, and if the hon. Gentleman now accepts—as I assume he does—that three pilots would be acceptable, what possible objection can he have to a fourth?

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman, who used to be a Minister, knows that his Government set up this Electoral Commission, and it has not changed its mind. However well I may get on with the hon. Member for Leigh, I will not necessarily prefer his opinion to that of the Electoral Commission, on the north-west or anything else. We must be guided by the experts in the Electoral Commission that the Government set up. We are not going to make much progress if Government Back Benchers want only to deride other opinions. I take the view that the other place is absolutely right to stick to its guns, and I hope that it continues to do so. We welcome the fact that the Government have made another small concession towards greater security of the poll, but we are certain that we are right to stick to three electoral regions. I hope that the other place also continues to do so.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): It is sad that we have gone back to having a slanging match, when what is needed is some cool thought and cool persuasion of the House of Lords to act sensibly in this matter.

We have now reached a position whereby returning officers in the north-west region will face almost impossible difficulties. In the past, most of them have been able to organise general elections efficiently with relatively short notice, and I am sure that they have been preparing since Christmas for an all-postal ballot. Both of those tasks can be managed perfectly efficiently.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con) rose—

Andrew Bennett: Let me develop my argument a little further.

Unfortunately, if the Lords hold to their proposals, we are now going to have a hybrid. Everyone has the chance to go to a polling station, but many people in the north-west will be annoyed that the House of Lords has thwarted their opportunity to have a postal ballot automatically. What will they then do? They will apply, as they have every right to do, for a postal vote over the next six or seven weeks. Instead of most people going to the polling station and just 3 or 4 per cent. voting by post, anything up to 25 or 30 per cent. of people will apply for postal votes. That will produce circumstances that are extremely difficult for returning officers to cope with. All the polling stations have to be in place, but so will most of the postal mechanisms, producing the worst of all worlds.

[Andrew Bennett]

Conservative Members say that they are concerned about fraud. There may have been some fraud with postal votes, but the fraud has been in the traditional, not the experimental areas, and has affected a relatively small number of votes. It might have been better to take earlier action to reduce the possibility of such fraud. As the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) said, steps were taken in Northern Ireland to achieve that, but it is not an option at this particular moment. My plea to the House of Lords is to make certain that we can have an all-postal ballot, which can be supervised as efficiently as any other system to reduce fraud.

As it stands now, people can apply for a postal vote to be sent to any named address. That makes it possible for people to collect such votes, which they should not be doing. Under an all-postal vote, however, those votes go to the address on the electoral register, which provides a very important safeguard. In fact, an all-postal ballot makes an election safer and less likely to result in fraud than one in which law-abiding citizens are put to the inconvenience of having to go to the polling station, when those who want to perpetrate fraud or malpractice can get postal votes.

I repeat my strong plea to the House of Lords closely to examine the current position. If the Lords want to eliminate or reduce fraud, the most effective way of doing so is to have an all-postal ballot in the north-west of England. That is clearly what most of my constituents want, and if the Lords try to deny them that opportunity it will spur many of them to secure postal votes, which will create the worst possible administrative nightmare for electoral registration officers.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett), although I would like to do so with slightly less frequency on this subject. I suggested yesterday evening that we were experiencing a version of "Groundhog Day", but I retract that comment because according to my recollection of the film, things eventually got better. Unfortunately, we seem to be making no progress with the Bill whatsoever, due to the Government's intransigence.

The facts of the case remain exactly as they always were. The Government wish to have pilot schemes—I stress the phrase "pilot schemes"—for all-postal voting, and they have considerable support, certainly from Liberal Democrats, in doing so. They said that they wanted three regions, and felt that that was an appropriate scale for the trial. That is exactly what they have in the Bill, before they amend it this evening. They set up the Electoral Commission some time ago in order to give advice, and they sought its advice on which and how many regions would be suitable. We realise that they were disappointed with the commission's initial response, which was that only two regions could be positively recommended.

Mr. Watts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman intervenes frequently in these debates. I wish that he would actually make a speech—then we could have all the interventions rolled into one. Let us have this evening's intervention.

Mr. Watts: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The essence of his argument seems to be that the commission should override the democratic will of this House of Commons. He was quite happy to overrule the commission in respect of countersigning, but he seems less willing to do so when it comes to postal votes. Does that have something to do with the elections for Liberal Democrat-controlled councils in Liverpool?

Mr. Heath: No, it does not. If the hon. Gentleman is going to intervene several times in each of these debates, I wish that he would invent some new interventions. Answering the same one time and again is getting rather tedious.

Mr. George Howarth rose—

Mr. Heath: Some Members would rather that we did not have the independent arbiter of the Electoral Commission, but why do we have it? It is in order to avoid ugly confrontations between the parties on matters on which there should be consensus and agreement. Indeed, that is exactly why we have the boundary commission. Of course, we remember the last Government who tried to overrule the boundary commission—it was Jim Callaghan in 1969 who tried to gerrymander the constituencies. That was a huge mistake, as even Labour party members now accept. What prevented that Government from doing so was the constitutional role of the other place. That is the clear precedent for what is happening today.

Mr. Howarth rose—

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Heath: The hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) has intervened many times, but I have not heard from the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall).

Mr. Pickthall: Does the hon. Gentleman realise what the Liberal Democrats, in collusion with the other lot, are trying to achieve? In effect, they are trying to reduce the potential turnout in the north-west by half. He understands the electoral arithmetic as well as anybody else. He understands that the British National party is more likely to gain seats on a low turnout than on a high turnout. How would the Liberal Democrats square their conscience if their effort to achieve their aims returned one or two BNP Members of the European Parliament under that voting system? To paraphrase Sir Thomas More, it is one thing to lose one's soul for the whole world, but for Liverpool?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman did come to an end—eventually. I am still—

Mr. Howarth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman said that I have intervened many times in this debate. For the sake of accuracy, I should point out that I have intervened once.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Heath: I was referring the serial debate that we are having on this subject. I shall of course apologise if

I am incorrect in saying that the hon. Gentleman has intervened during the previous occasions on which we have debated these matters.

Mr. Howarth: For the sake of accuracy, may I say that I have never intervened in a debate on this matter previously? The hon. Gentleman clearly has made a mistake. I accept that he did not do so with any ill intent.

Mr. Heath: I certainly did not do so and I apologise unreservedly to the hon. Gentleman. I sought only to introduce a new face into the proceedings.

Mr. Howarth rose—

Mr. Heath: Does the hon. Gentleman now want to intervene substantively?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I gently suggest that we get on with the debate?

Mr. Heath: Let us return to the genuine issues involved.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: May I just make some progress? I will let the hon. Gentleman intervene later.

The debate is now simply about whether we should have the three regions that the Minister said were his intention. For 90 per cent. of the proceedings on the Bill, that was exactly what he wanted. He was disappointed when he got only two. Like the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), he was apparently unaware of the later advice of the Electoral Commission. It said that Yorkshire and Humberside could be added. My noble Friends tabled an amendment to precisely that effect in another place and that is what is now in the Bill. It was only when the Minister had three regions that he decided to add another to his shopping list.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heath: In a moment.

The hon. Member for West Lancashire asked me why we were trying to reduce the options for the north-west, but of course we are not. I want a sensible answer from the Government and the Back Benchers who are here this evening—I notice that many of them are from the north-west or Yorkshire and Humberside—to why, if this is so imperative for the north-west, it is not for the south-west. If it is so imperative for the east midlands, why is it not for the west midlands? If it is so imperative for the north of England, why is it not for the south of England, or Scotland or Wales? The Government have failed to answer that question.

The Government simply say that we have to increase turnout, but only in those regions where we choose to increase turnout. I have said all the way along the line that had the Government come forward with a proposal for universal postal voting across the whole country, I could have understood that. That would have had a logic to it. There is a logic to doing it across the whole country and there is a logic to having pilots. There is not a logic for postal voting in areas that are not recommended by the Electoral Commission; in one half of England, one third of the United Kingdom and not the rest.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Gentleman suggested one reason. The hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) suggested another and entirely different reason for the change. It was a repetition of one suggested by his noble Friend Lord Hoyle in the House of Lords. It is the novel doctrine that if one does not like the anticipated outcome of an election, one changes the system. That is exactly what the hon. Member for West Lancashire suggested.

Mr. Pickthall: No.

Mr. Turner: He denies it, but he said that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) would have on his conscience a success for the British National party if he did not allow the measure through. I would like to know whether that is the doctrine of the Government or merely the doctrine of a few extraordinary Government Back Benchers.

Mr. Heath: It is another of the spurious arguments that we have had introduced into this debate on a number of occasions. I do not think that it is the Government's official position.

Andy Burnham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: No. The hon. Gentleman has intervened an awful lot in this debate. We have really had enough of the hon. Gentleman on this subject.

If I had heard any logical explanation for the Government's position, I might have been more persuaded of the validity of it, but the genuine case was more than clearly exhibited earlier. When the Minister was introducing the Government's case, who were sitting on either side of him? We had the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister for Local and Regional Government and the right hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). They are the ones who are running this show, not the Department for Constitutional Affairs. What an excuse for a Department it is. It cannot make its own decisions or do what it believes is right. It is led by the nose by another Department. What a disgraceful position for the Minister and, even more, for the Lord Chancellor and Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, who—surprisingly—appears to have no interest in the legislation.

8.15 pm

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): Whatever the hon. Gentleman may think of my right hon. Friends the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister for Local and Regional Government, they are elected Members of this House, unlike the hereditary peers next door—the marquesses and barons—who are overruling the primacy of this House. That is all that this argument is about.

Mr. Heath: If one does not like the unelected House of Lords, one should do something about it. One should not shilly-shally because one is afraid of what the Prime Minister will say. One should not ignore the views of one's Back Benchers because one is not convinced that one can get it through the other place. One should legislate. Until the hon. Lady is prepared to persuade her right hon. Friends in the Cabinet that it is time that we had a proper, democratic House of Lords, she has no reason to argue anything else.

The hon. Lady talks about primacy. In this instance, she is talking not about the primacy of the House of Commons, but the primacy of the Labour party. It does not like it when an argument is made against it.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Has my hon. Friend noticed that it is the Deputy Prime Minister who has resisted all attempts in Cabinet to introduce an elected second Chamber?

Mr. Heath: Yes, the Deputy Prime Minister is the guilty man. His attempts at bullying on the issue are well documented. The hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) was wrong to say that the letter to the Electoral Commission had not been put in the Library: it was there on Thursday. [Interruption.] I see that the hon. Gentleman has a copy now.

The most remarkable aspect of the debate is that the Bill was introduced in the last Session because it was so urgent that it needed to be in place by the beginning of the year.

Shona McIsaac: It was blocked.

Mr. Heath: It was not blocked. The Government did nothing with it. I have the chronology of events in my hand. The Bill was introduced into this House on 17 September, but it was months before it was even debated in the other place. We are now told that the returning officers are in a terrible position, but that is because of the Government's actions—[Interruption.] What did the Deputy Prime Minister write to the chairman of the Electoral Commission—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May we have fewer interventions from sedentary positions? I am having difficulty hearing the hon. Gentleman who is addressing the House.

Mr. Heath: What the Deputy Prime Minister wrote to the chairman of the Electoral Commission on 22 March shows the regard in which he holds that body. He wanted a revised opinion and, after several paragraphs about what he wanted the commission to give an opinion on—in the hope that he would get something helpful to his position—he wrote:

> "I appreciate that tomorrow you have public Hearings in Scotland, but Parliament needs to know what the commission's position is to enable it to consider amendments to the bill. I would be grateful if we could have your response by 3pm tomorrow at the latest to enable us to table any necessary amendments to the Bill before it returns to the Commons on Wednesday 24 March."

The Deputy Prime Minister asked for a revised opinion from the Electoral Commission, giving it fewer than 24 hours to make a considered response.

Mr. Leslie: If the hon. Gentleman were being fair, he would recognise that the letter was a response to the amendment tabled by the odd alliance in the other place, which suggested that we should abrogate this decision to the Electoral Commission. In that case, it seems only reasonable to ask the Electoral Commission its view of that amendment.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman may think that it is reasonable—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] Hon. Members say "Ah" as though they had considered the matter carefully and considered it an outrage. Were the Government really expecting reasoned advice from the Electoral Commission in only five hours on a matter that had been before the Government since September last year?

Mr. Hancock: My hon. Friend has been generous in giving way. He has made a compelling case for the inclusion of the south and the south-west in the pilot scheme, but the Government have resisted it. During the many debates on this issue, has he come across a compelling reason for denying us that opportunity while including the north-west?

Mr. Heath: The most irritating thing about the whole debate is that the Government have never given us their reasons for doing that, apart from the fact—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Heath: I shall not give way any more. I have already spoken for long enough. I have given way far more than any other Member and there have been enough interventions.

The point—

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has just heard the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) say that he will not give way again.

Mr. Heath: By saying so, I disappointed my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh)—but never mind, I am not going to take any more interventions.

We have never been offered any sensible arguments for the choice of the north-west over the rest of the country. All we have heard is the Government's assertion that they will have their way in the north of England. They have not tried to address the issues for the south of England, Wales and Scotland.

In the other place, Lord Filkin argued that the choice would somehow improve the quality of information to be gathered from the pilots to inform future decisions. Having worked for Lord Filkin in local government, I have some respect for him—

Mr. Leslie: What about me?

Mr. Heath: I shall have respect for the hon. Gentleman when he stands up to his colleagues and actually does something sensible about the Bill.

Lord Filkin's argument was that the value of the pilots would be greatly improved if the north-west were included. However, the reverse is the case. If we are seriously holding pilots to improve election technique, what better control could there be than to hold all-postal elections in Yorkshire and Humber on one side of the Pennines and in the north-west on the other side? We could then compare the two. We could look at the problems, such as the level of any fraud that took place and any difficulties in the system, and make sensible arrangements for universal provision. A scientist would say that for an experiment, one needs an experimental subject and a control—[HON. MEMBERS: "The south-west."] The south-west is hardly a comparable region to the north-west. If any hon. Member believes that the north-west has similar characteristics to the south-west—

Ian Stewart: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not a convention of the House that when a Member refers directly to another Member, that Member is allowed to intervene?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is entirely a matter for the Member who is addressing the House at the time.

Mr. Heath: The only person to whom I can recall making a reference was Lord Filkin and I do not think that he is allowed to intervene in this place. I am baffled by the hon. Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart)—

Ian Stewart rose—

Mr. Heath: I am so baffled that I shall accept his intervention so that he can explain what he is talking about.

Ian Stewart: In his very theatrical contribution, the hon. Gentleman said that he wanted to know who had asked for the pilot to be held in the north-west and why that region had been chosen rather than another one. I am in favour of other regions having the same facilities, but the question now is why should the hon. Gentleman, his colleagues and Members of an unelected House stop my constituents from having the right to a postal ballot. We held a postal ballot pilot in Salford and in one ward where turnout had been 12 per cent. it went up to 25 per cent. That is one reason why we should hold postal ballots.

Mr. Heath: All right. I have listened to what the hon. Gentleman said. He has had an all-postal ballot in Salford; I have had an all-postal ballot in my constituency. He is denying my constituents—

Ian Stewart indicated dissent.

Mr. Heath: Yes, he is. That is what the Bill says. He should read the Bill. It will be illegal for—

Ian Stewart: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I very much hope that this is a point of order, not a matter of debate, because time is running out and other hon. Members want to contribute.

Ian Stewart: It is a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I made it clear in my contribution that I am in favour of other regions having postal ballots.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a spurious point of order; it is a matter for debate.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Bill says that there will be no all-postal ballots this June in any municipal election in any area outside the four regions.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heath: No, I shall conclude my remarks. I have taken long enough.

I simply say that the only way in which we can have integrity in our voting systems is if all parties in the House respect the integrity of those systems and accept the fact that they need to build consensus and accept the advice of independent arbiters. That is exactly what the Government are determined not to do. They have got exactly what they asked for at the start of the Bill's consideration. Why do they not just accept it, stop this nonsense right away tonight and let the returning officers get on with running a successful election?

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): We have only a few minutes, and I have only a few points to make. This ping-pong cannot go on indefinitely. I want the north-west to be included in the postal ballots, but we have a common interest in ensuring that the integrity of the ballot is maintained. That does not divide us.

Reference has been made throughout the debate to what happened in Pendle in 2002. Members can read the remarks of Lord Greaves in the Lords Hansard of 29 January. It is all set out there, but the fact is that, after a year-long police investigation, no prosecutions were brought and there were no convictions. I am getting fed up with the constant smearing about what is happening in my constituency. Some practices are not unlawful, but they are unsavoury. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) referred to the fact that it is not unlawful to send postal ballots to an address other than the voter's address. That is an incredible state of affairs, but it is true. If postal ballots are universal in the north-west on 10 June, as I hope, every elector will get his or her postal ballot delivered to his or her own address. That will do more than anything else to combat fraud.

The Electoral Commission produced a report, with a series of recommendations, a year ago in March 2003. I am glad to say that one of those recommendations has been picked up by the Government and forms the basis of the Government amendment tonight. That is good—I welcome it—but the Electoral Commission's other recommendations are still in the pipeline. I tell my hon. Friend the Minister that to nail those smears—if that is what people do to smears—let us put in place those recommendations from the Electoral Commission. I am thinking about the development of a protocol that considers who is responsible for following up allegations of electoral fraud. That was suggested by the Electoral Commission a year ago. Let us do it now, and let us send people who are guilty of electoral fraud to prison for a long time. That is what Labour Members want because we believe in maintaining the integrity of the ballot. Rigorous checks should be made after significant elections to unearth fraud if it takes place. All those recommendations have been around for a year and I want the Government to act on them.

Before my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) tries to intervene, let me conclude by saying that I am fed up with all the spurious arguments that have been recycled three, four or five times in the House of Lords. The will of the elected House must prevail on this matter. Let us vote this through and let us have clean elections on 10 June.

Dr. Pugh: When this process started, I really did not believe the conspiracy theory that it was a ploy to get more Labour votes. I was genuinely relaxed about the electoral outcome. I could see the arguments for and the good arguments against. However, tonight I have been astonished by the Government's unwillingness to compromise with the Lords and the Electoral Commission, by their willingness to find more and more time in the parliamentary calendar for this quite small piece of legislation, and by the massive turnout in force of Government luminaries, including the Leader of the House.

8.30 pm

If this issue were just about electoral pilots and not Labour's political advantage, why has there been all this pressure and excitement among Labour Members? The game has already been given away by the reference by the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) to the Liverpool outcome and by the reference by the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) to what the British National party might do. Fundamentally, it has been given away by the excitement of Labour Members.

Mr. Watts: Does the hon. Gentleman not believe that it is more likely that the motivation—

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [8 March].

Question accordingly agreed to.

Business of the House

8.45 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I would like to make a short business statement. Further to my business statement of last week, the House will wish to know that we may now consider any further Lords message that may be received either at the commencement or the conclusion of business on 1 April.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Is it not appropriate that it will be April fools' day when the Government will be using extra time to force through changes to the electoral system in the face of the opposition of the Electoral Commission and all parties in this Parliament? Even the Greens voted with us in the House of Lords.

Will the time for the Easter Adjournment debate on Thursday be protected? Can the right hon. Gentleman assure us that there will no other ministerial statements that day? Is he aware that a third of the Labour Lords failed to attend the vote today in the other place? Instead of continuing his vendetta with the other place, will he think again and remember the correct procedure in this country for changing electoral procedures? We should reach agreement among all the parties and not have these sorts of changes pushed through using a temporary Commons majority, which if the Government go on this way will not last another year.

Mr. Hain: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that April fools' day ends at midday, and that these matters will be discussed after midday? He should at least get his early interventions correct.

This was not done in the face of the advice of the Electoral Commission. All the pilot areas selected, which were all proposed by the Government, were recommended by the commission in either the first or second category. Surely the hon. Gentleman will understand that the intention is to hold all-postal referendums in October, just three to four months after these elections. It is a matter of getting the pilots going so that we have the postal voting in place so that it can continue in October.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether there would be any other statements on Thursday. I cannot give him that assurance. Nor can I give him an assurance that we will go beyond 6 pm.

This is a simple business statement to deal with an unprecedented situation. According to the records that we have been able to discover, we have never been in a situation where the House of Lords has disagreed on so many occasions. We hope that after the narrow vote—only six votes prevented the Government's position from being carried in the other place—there will be a reasonable reconsideration. We are grateful for the support that has been received from Cross-Bench peers, who understand that this is a matter of democracy. It is in the interests of the majority of people to be able to vote. Postal votes encourage them to do so, and all good democrats should support that.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that while the content of the Bill is of considerable importance, the issues are now entirely different? The House of Lords, instead of acting as a revising—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is on his feet.

Mr. Kaufman: The House of Lords, instead of acting as a revising Chamber, is pitting its will against the House of Commons. That was precisely what the Liberal party decided to prevent in 1910 when its Budget was rejected by the House of Lords. That was why the Parliament Act 1911 was passed with a Liberal majority in this place.

Is it not also a fact that it is almost certain—[Interruption.] That lot will never win an election to get a majority in this place, so they are using the other place. It is almost certain—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order.

Mr. Kaufman: It is almost certain that there has been no occasion since the Liberal party passed the Parliament Act that the House of Lords has pitted itself against the House of Commons so many times. Does my right hon. Friend agree not only that is it essential for the will of the House of Commons to prevail, but that at the next election we should ask the electorate to agree to a manifesto reducing—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has made his point.

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend made his point with his customary eloquence and elegance. May I clarify one of his comments? It is not necessarily the House of Lords, but the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats in the House of Lords who are in an unholy alliance to deny more and more people the opportunity of voting in the pilot areas.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I do not intend to go back to 1910, despite the recollection of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). I want to go back to 1969. In 1969 the then Labour Prime Minister, Mr. James Callaghan—[HON. MEMBERS: "1979."]—tried to push through—this is a true precedent—[HON. MEMBERS: "1979"]—1969—

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): Mr. Callaghan was Home Secretary in 1969.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I stand corrected. The Home Secretary of the day, Mr. James Callaghan, attempted to gerrymander—attempted to overrule—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a very narrow debate. I have been generous up to now on the motion. I ask hon. Members to restrict their comments to the subject matter of the debate, and likewise their responses.

Mr. Tyler: The terms of the business motion imply that the views of the Electoral Commission are to be disregarded. I am sure that the Leader of the House did not intend to mislead the House a few minutes ago. The chairman of the Electoral Commission—to whom the right hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members have referred, so I am sure it must be in order, Madam Deputy Speaker—specifically said that the commission could not positively recommend the addition of a fourth area, the north-west region, to the pilot studies. That is specific—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not appropriate to discuss the substance of what the House will discuss on Thursday. I ask hon. Members to restrict their comments to the business statement before the House.

Mr. Tyler: I understand precisely what you are saying, Madam Deputy Speaker. As the Leader of the House indicated, this is germane to the business motion before the House. We are being asked in very difficult circumstances to deal with an extremely important issue on which the advisers to both the Government and Parliament—the Electoral Commission—have indicated their view. The Leader of the House made great play of the fact that the other place is not elected. That is in his hands. His Government do not have the guts to change the composition of the other place. I hope that he will now announce when that House is to be elected.

Mr. Hain: I am not sure that it would be correct for me to respond to the last point in the context of the business statement. As the hon. Gentleman referred to the views of Sam Younger, the chairman of the Electoral Commission, I shall quote from a letter he sent to the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie). He writes:

"It is of course for Parliament to decide the number of all postal regions."

The House of Commons has repeatedly made its decision clear, including only a few minutes ago. The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) should accept the will of the House of Commons and not rely on an inflated Conservative majority in the House of Lords to defy the will of the House of Commons.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Is it not disgraceful that the House of Lords continues to defy and overrule this elected House of Commons, which must be the supreme House in this place? Will my right hon. Friend reconsider his decision to withdraw the proposals to reform the Lords, which would set up more sensible arrangements, make it clear that the House of Commons has supremacy and state that the House of Lords does not have the right continually to defy the House of Commons?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes the important point that the issue is constitutionally unprecedented. The House of Lords cannot continue to defy the elected will of the House of Commons when the House of Commons has repeatedly voted in this way.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): The Leader of the House did not answer the most important part of the representations by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), which concerns the Easter Adjournment debate. I regularly attend those debates, and I hope to attend on Thursday to raise important constituency matters. The Leader of the House is the custodian of the rights of hon. Members and is there to see that we get fair play as Back Benchers. Will he make a commitment that those of us who want to raise matters of far more importance to my constituents than this ping-pong will have a suitable amount of time in which to hold that debate on Thursday?

[Mrs. Angela Browning]

Mr. Hain: The easy solution to the hon. Lady's predicament is to get her Conservative colleagues in the House of Lords to agree to the decision made only a few minutes ago in the House of Commons, in which case there would be no reason to reduce the time for the Easter Adjournment debate.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Will the Leader of the House confirm the rest of Sam Younger's letter? It goes on to say that

"The considerations as set out in our December Report regarding the North West have not changed . . . For the reasons set out in my letter of 4 March we are not persuaded of the merits of piloting in 4 regions."

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already advised the House that we are not debating the substance of the Bill.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend tell me whether Thursday's debate, which may be affected by the business statement, can be used to discuss the relationship between this Chamber and the other place? Tonight, we are being bound over for the 13th time since the general election by the other place defying the view of the elected Chamber, which happened on only three occasions between 1979 and 1997. It is clear that the challenge from the other place is not about revision but about the fundamental politics by which the people elected us to this place.

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend makes a compelling case, which is why I am sure that common sense will prevail at this late stage and that Members of the House of Lords will decide, particularly because the vote was so narrow—only six votes in it—that the will of the House of Commons should prevail.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): As the Leader of the House of Commons is discussing Commons business, will he confirm whether a further business motion will be required tomorrow to give effect to what he has said to the House this evening? Will the Leader of the House give my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) a proper answer and undertake to protect the time available to Members of the House for our Adjournment debate on Thursday, which has nothing to do with the other place, even if he has to make a last-minute adjustment to the business in a panic? Will he give us such a guarantee?

Mr. Hain: I guarantee the right hon. Gentleman that he can have all the time that he wants on Thursday if the House of the Lords supports the decision of the House of Commons. That is the solution to his problem.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The business statement was narrow, and we must move on.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

SOCIAL SECURITY

That the draft Jobseeker's Allowance (Amendment) Regulations 2004, which were laid before this House on 2nd March, be approved.—[Mr. Heppell:]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Higher Education Bill

8.59 pm

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): I should like to present a petition on behalf of well over 1,000 members of the National Union of Students at Orpington college, which is an absolutely first-class college.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The petition of Orpington College Student Union and NUS members,

Declares that the petitioners are united in their opposition to the Government's Higher Education Bill.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons decline to pass the Higher Education Bill at Third Reading.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

European Constitution

9 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): It is a privilege to be able to present this substantial petition comprising 121 pages of signatures from about 1,000 of my constituents, and I am pleased to be able to say that I agree wholeheartedly with the contents.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The petition of persons living or working in the Parliamentary constituency of Christchurch

Declares that the proposed European Constitution with which Her Majesty's Government has agreed in principle involves grave and significant constitutional issues that affect democracy in the United Kingdom, self government, and the national interest and makes a fundamental change in the relationship of the United Kingdom with the European Union.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons passes legislation to authorise a referendum of the electorate on the European Constitution at the conclusion of the intergovernmental conference.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

NHS Dentistry

9.1 pm

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): It gives me great pleasure to present a petition signed by some 4,000 locals in Dumfries and Galloway to protest at the inadequate provision of NHS dentistry.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The petition of residents of Dumfries and Galloway declares that provision of NHS dentists in Dumfries and Galloway is unacceptably low, with over 40,000 local people who are not registered with an NHS dentist and are unable to do so. The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Scottish Executive to take immediate action to rectify the situation.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Prittle Brook Sewer

9.2 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Some women's institutes pose for calendars and some bake cakes, but the Hadleigh Evening WI is an effective, tough campaigning machine fighting for its community, along with excellent local councillors and caring, dedicated residents such as Colin Henwood and Don Saunders, who fought for many years to resolve the problem of Prittle Brook sewer, which floods some homes with water and sometimes raw sewage, with all the distress, danger and disruption that that causes.

Anglia Water is an excellent company; I met its representatives today. They want to eliminate sewer flooding in homes and care about customer service. The problem lies with Ofwat and the Government, who must ensure that funds for the necessary repairs are released so that Anglia can do the job once and for all. I congratulate Maureen Hurrell, Sheila Whitelegg, Yvonne Grimes and all the WI ladies on compiling the petition, which states:

To the Honourable Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament Assembled

The Humble Petition of Mrs M Hurrell and others of like disposition sheweth

That there is considerable public concern caused by the long standing failure of the Prittle Brook sewer, which causes serious health concerns and damage to property every year.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House shall urge the Government, and in particular, DEFRA, to investigate this matter and to ensure that the necessary investment is made to permanently resolve the problem so that residents can live in their homes without continual fear of flooding by surface water and raw sewage.

And your Petitioners, in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Sub-Post Office Closures (Wakefield)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

9.3 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I am most grateful for this opportunity to raise my concerns over the proposed closure of four sub-post offices in my constituency. I have followed very closely the discussions, which have taken place over many years under two different Governments regarding the future of the post office network. I have fully accepted the need to modernise the network to respond to social, economic and technological changes. I have strongly supported the Horizon project, the logic of the provision of modern online IT facilities and, in particular, the extension of the Post Office's arrangement with the high street banks.

I welcomed the installation of cash machines and the overall automation of the network, which led to the Post Office becoming a gateway for delivering electronic and other services. In correspondence with constituents and the occasional anxious sub-postmaster or mistress, I have argued the logic of modernising the network, in the genuine belief that the proposals were in the best interests of the people whom I represent. However, in the past three months, to cite Jarvis Cocker, I have come to the gradual, soul-destroying realisation that I have been most monumentally had.

What I believed to be modernisation turned out to be marketisation; what is termed "urban reinvention" means, in my back yard, putting the boot into some of my most vulnerable constituents. Frankly, I did not expect that from a Labour Government. If the Minister intends to tell me that it is a matter for the Post Office, I say to him now that that simply will not wash. We were used to Pontius Pilate jobs under the Tories, but I am not prepared to accept that from my party. The Minister can and should do something.

As the Minister knows, the proposals to close the Thornes, St. Michael's, Agbrigg road and Haddingley Hill sub-post offices were announced in a letter that was sent out by the Post Office's head of area, Mr. David Mellows-Facer, on 29 December last year. The Minister will appreciate that probably the best time to make such an unpopular announcement is between Christmas and new year. Parliament is not sitting and most Members of Parliament and other public representatives are having a Christmas break. In short, the announcement was a classic Jo Moore job—burying the bad news.

I found out about the proposals from the local press. I strongly resent the fact that I received such important information at second hand. I did not receive Mr. Mellows-Facer's letter until 9 January, because it was sent to the wrong address. Given that my constituency office has been listed as my contact address for many years, and that the other, fairly obvious point of contact for a Member of Parliament is the House of Commons, it is astonishing that the letter was sent to the Yorkshire regional Labour party headquarters.

Even if I had received the letter on time, it is unacceptable that my constituents and I were given only until 9 February to respond to what was described as "a consultation process". I had less than four weeks to develop a detailed response to proposals that will undoubtedly have a serious impact on the lives of the people whom I represent. That is disgraceful. However, it was par for the course. The kindest thing that I can say about the consultation process is that it was a complete joke. Unfortunately, it is hard to see the funny side when three of the four closures impact on some of the most disadvantaged areas in my constituency, and the fourth, Thornes, affects an especially large population of elderly people.If the Post Office had deliberately targeted the most vulnerable in picking out those four sub-post offices, it could not have done a better job.

The Minister knows that I tabled a series of parliamentary questions about the way in which the Post Office has developed its proposals and consultation process. I am disappointed with the answers that I have received so far. They have been very much in the "not me, guv" mode. I was especially disappointed that the Minister refused to instruct the Post Office to publish a profile of the select teams of personnel who walked between each sub-post office that was proposed for closure in Wakefield and the named alternative branch. Not unreasonably, I believed that it was important to know how many members of the select teams replicated the age profile of the customers who would be expected to travel further afield, and how many were physically disabled, wheelchair users, the elderly and very elderly, or people wheeling pushchairs and accompanied by young children.

I have received many letters from people who are angry and deeply upset about the way in which the proposals will impact on them and their loved ones. I shall read only one, which was sent directly to Mr. Mellows-Facer by the daughter of an elderly couple who would be affected by the proposed Thornes closure. She wrote:

"My father is 85 years of age and practically housebound, being cared for by my 80 year old mother who collects their pension weekly from the Thornes Post Office. It is a manageable 20 minute walk there and back for her and she can meet and chat to friends on the way. (In addition, she can buy essentials such as milk from this branch.) It is also a short break from the house for her, as she does not like to leave my father on his own for much longer than half an hour at a time.

You suggest that she could use the 119/120 bus service to access either the Kirkgate or the Lupset Bar branches if the Thornes branch is closed. This bus service runs hourly in each direction. After collecting their pension from the Kirkgate branch, my mother would have to cross the busy Kirkgate road to catch the return bus. At the Lupset Bar branch she would have to walk down to the bus stop by the park and then would have an hour's wait, in the open as there are no facilities for shelter etc, on this road. The local newspaper, the Wakefield Express, has also recently reported that this bus service is to be curtailed in future as it is not well used.

Both alternative branches are too far away for my mother to walk to and so the only other solution is for her to take a taxi. I find it disgraceful that she should have to pay taxi fares every week to collect their pensions."

In a later letter to me, she said:

"After much discussion my parents have decided to register to collect their pension at the general post office on Northgate. My mother now has to catch a bus on Denby Dale road into town, walk to the GPO, collect her money, walk back to the bus station, and catch another bus home again—all this at 80 years of age—plus my father has to be left alone while she travels to Wakefield. Once again it is the elderly, who find it hardest to cope, who are inconvenienced in the name of progress."

If they are using the general post office in Northgate, I only hope that this elderly lady can cope with queuing for up to half an hour, which is apparently a frequent experience that will no doubt worsen as a consequence of the proposed closures.

I was also disappointed with the Minister's answer to my question on the steps taken to monitor the factual accuracy of information on which closure proposals have been based. He told me on 22 March:

"The public consultation process enables any factual inaccuracies in the proposals to be identified".—[Official Report, 22 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 520W.]

What he did not say is what difference it makes to closure proposals when the information on which they are based is found to be fundamentally flawed.

I do not have the time to detail all the erroneous information contained in the consultation document. The farcical nature of procedures that the Minister appears to be defending, however, is particularly well illustrated by the proposals concerning the St. Michael's sub-post office. Dewsbury road, Wakefield, is described as "a rural area of mixed occupations, with some of the population working in agriculture and crafts".

I invite the Minister to take a stroll with me through the rural idyll that is Dewsbury road, Wakefield. I will give him a fiver for every chicken, cow and pig that he sees, and a tenner if he meets a farmer. The simple fact is that Dewsbury road is an urban, built-up area running from Westgate End to the city and constituency boundary. Whoever says otherwise is living in cloud cuckoo land.

The Post Office's assessment of those served by the Thornes sub-post office also confirms the cloud cuckoo land theory. Apparently, the population is "largely young". It is not. It has among the highest numbers of elderly and very elderly people in my constituency. Alms houses in Horne street and the Whitehouse bungalows are among several that specifically accommodate the elderly. The Thornleigh estate and Thornes Moor estate house significant numbers of retired constituents who, like the elderly couple to whom I have already referred, may simply be unable to access the proposed alternative in Kirkgate.

The assessment of St. Michael's sub-post office talks of a "largely young population" who presumably will have little trouble accessing the alternatives, providing that they can avoid the cow pats on Dewsbury road. I have a rather different impression, however, of a population with a large number of low-income and elderly people. Neither of the alternatives proposed, and in particular the Dewsbury road sub-post office, is within walking distance, especially for elderly people, and this closure will cause particular difficulties for many of the current customers.

As I pointed out in my written response to Mr. Mellows-Facer, many of the current users of the Agbrigg road sub-post office are elderly and disabled people from the Belle Vue area, who had to use Agbrigg road sub-post office when the Doncaster road sub-post office closed some years ago. This is a low-income area with low car ownership, and suggesting Sandal sub-post office as an alternative for most of the current users is completely inappropriate, given the difficulty of accessing it from Agbrigg and Belle Vue, especially for residents living to the east of Doncaster road.

The customer profile of Haddingley Hill sub-post office describes

"a large number of young families", but turns a now familiar blind eye to the impact of the closure on the large number of elderly and very elderly people currently served. Why is there no mention of the fact that this outlet is used by a large number of elderly people living in flats and other purpose-built accommodation in Manygates crescent and Duke of York avenue? Why is there no mention of the fact that immediately across the road are the flats and sheltered housing complexes in Woodcock street and Sparable lane? Why, according to one of the Minister's answers to me, are the health and social care implications of the closures

"operational matters for Post Office Ltd"?—[Official Report, 22 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 520W.]

Has the Minister never been contacted by a sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress in his constituency who is concerned about some aspect of the health and well-being of an elderly customer, or does that only happen in Yorkshire? Is it not right that those people have served as a point of contact with outside help for those who may have few other ways of obtaining such help?

Let me illustrate the problem by referring to the individual circumstances of two people. The first is a gentleman who lived a few streets away from me until he died a couple of years ago. His name was Alf Watson, and he served his country during world war two. He never recovered from some of the things that happened then. He was an accomplished rugby league player and played professionally on the Leeds side which played in the challenge cup final against Bradford Northern, at Wembley in 1947. Towards the end of his life, when he was not finding things easy, he had two particular props—I use the word "props" in the widest sense. One was a very good neighbour; the other was the former sub-postmaster at Haddingley Hill sub-post office, who helped Alf retain his independence against all the odds. Significantly, when Alf died he left his most prized possessions—his rugby league medals—to the former sub-postmaster. The Minister may regard such a caring role as but I regard it as basic humanity. I hope the Government may encourage such basic humanity.

The second person I want to mention illustrates the fact that the consultation process take no account of the likely impact of the proposed closure on the local economy in the immediate area of three of the four sub-post offices in Wakefield, which are located near other retail outlets. I feel that that impact should have been considered.

This second gentleman is 83, with a similarly distinguished war record. He is a widower living alone in the Milnthorpe area of Wakefield, which was removed from my constituency in 1997 by the Boundary Commission. For some reason it felt that Farnley Tyas near Huddersfield had more in common with Wakefield city. This gentleman has taken the modernisation agenda fully on board, accessing his Co-op bank account and conducting his domestic financial transactions at Haddingley Hill sub-post office. He takes a taxi from his home to Haddingley Hill, or "busy corner" as it is more commonly known, where he also visits the freezer centre, the chemist, the butcher/greengrocer and the newsagent. He has been known very occasionally to visit the off-licence and the pub, The Foresters—but not, as far as I am aware, the suntan centre. There are two sub-post offices near where he lives, but neither has adjacent parades of shops where he can obtain all that he needs for the week. He could go to a supermarket, but is not up to walking around it or queueing at the checkout. He and many others like him have been simply disregarded in the closure process.

The gentleman's name, by the way, is the right hon. Walter Harrison. He is my predecessor as Member for Wakefield, which he represented for 23 years. He was probably the most legendary Whip ever to pin a Back Bencher against a wall—but he will not be pinning me against a wall for refusing to support the Government in last week's vote on post offices. Like many others in my area who have solidly supported the Labour party all their lives, he shares my view that what is happening to our sub-post offices is not what we expected of a Labour Government. Both he and I sincerely hope that it is not too late for the Minister to do something about it.

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services (Mr. Stephen Timms): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on securing the debate. He has been very energetic in voicing local concerns about the post office closure proposals on behalf of his constituents, and he made a powerful speech this evening, not least when citing the name of Walter Harrison in support of his case. He tabled a number of parliamentary questions on the subject over the past few weeks, and I endeavoured to answer them—albeit not, as he made clear, entirely to his satisfaction.

My hon. Friend has clearly spelled out his views and concerns about the impact of the post office closures that will shortly take place in his constituency and about the consultation process that preceded those decisions. I am grateful to him for accepting the need for change. He said that he was concerned about the process of marketisation, but I would make the point that sub-post offices have always been private businesses—for more than 100 years, going right back to the beginnings of the Post Office. Those who run sub-post offices as private businesses must be able to make a reasonable living, and it is part of the Government's responsibility to ensure that that occurs. That provides an important part of the background to the process of change that we are currently going through.

I agree with my hon. Friend, for precisely the reasons that he set out, about the importance of maintaining a viable nationwide network of post offices. It is important that sub-post offices and their proprietors, the sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses, are able, as they always have, to provide strong support to vulnerable individuals among their customers. My hon. Friend is right to make that point, which is one of the reasons why it is important that the Government maintain a viable nationwide network of post offices and stop unmanaged gaps from opening up in that network.

The starting point of our policy for the network is the performance and innovation unit's 2000 report, with which my hon. Friend will be familiar, "Modernising the Post Office Network". It was widely welcomed as squaring up honestly and finally to the challenges that the network faces. It made 24 recommendations for the future, all of which the Government accepted. The PIU report showed quite starkly that our network of post offices had not kept pace with the changing needs of its customers, and that too often post offices had become dingy and shabby through lack of investment, as a result of which the network was losing business.

The Post Office faces an enormous challenge. For the last financial year, Post Office Ltd. lost £194 million before exceptional items. In the previous year, it lost £163 million. About 97 per cent. of the nation's post offices are private businesses run by sub-postmasters, but with declining profitability in the network as a whole—and, in very many cases, at individual office level—the ability of those sub-postmasters to sell on their businesses has also declined. That is how they often moved on in the past, but it has taken a very severe knock. Decisive action was needed to ensure that we maintained a sustainable countrywide network for the future, which is the action that the Government have been taking.

My hon. Friend knows that the post office network has been contracting since the 1960s. There have been reductions in post office usage for all sorts of reasons, and the absence of investment in the past was an important one, but big changes in technology, greater mobility, changes in shopping and financial habits have all meant that a large proportion of all our constituents are simply not using the post office in the way that they used to—and custom has sharply reduced as a result.

Before responding to some of my hon. Friend's points, I mention some telling comparative figures. In 1996, 26 per cent. of benefit recipients received their cash paid directly into their bank accounts; in April last year, just before the transition to direct payments started, that proportion had risen to 43 per cent. In quite a short period, dramatic reductions in the use of the post office network took place, which we needed to take into account.

If we want an urban post office network that is the right size for the volume of business now available to it, there have to be—in addition to the new technology and the introduction of banking facilities that my hon. Friend welcomed—closures in the urban network. I do not know whether my hon. Friend feels that a different set of four sub-post offices should have been proposed for closure, but that was the key question facing the Post Office and Postwatch in embarking on this exercise.

I gather that, at the start of the programme, there were 31 post offices in my hon. Friend's constituency, of which 13 were classified by Post Office Ltd. as urban. Last September, Post Office Ltd decided to prepare closure proposals on an area plan basis, using the parliamentary constituencies grouped together, where appropriate, to give a clearer, "once over the ground" view of future service provision. I take my hon. Friend's point about the awkwardness of the date of 29 December, but he will appreciate that announcements are continually being made, given the scale of the exercise. Nevertheless, he makes a fair point about the date on which the area plan was published. There were four closure proposals in respect of the branches that he has mentioned.

Postwatch considered each of the proposals carefully before concluding that, in this case, there were insufficient grounds to oppose them. It therefore chose not to refer the four proposals to the escalation and review process. I have looked at Postwatch's comments, and in all four cases it accepted that there was not enough business for the branches to remain viable. In each case, there is an alternative office located within half a mile or so. Postwatch draws attention to one important consideration. In its view, the closure of two branches—Agbrigg road and Haddingley Hill—enabled the strengthening, and therefore the long-term viability, of two other offices in designated deprived urban locations that are not too far away, and which might otherwise themselves have been at risk.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I am listening carefully to what the Minister is saying, but Agbrigg road in particular has heard it all before. Exactly the same arguments were advanced when people were relocated from Doncaster road. Will he address my concern about what happens when people have to relocate and to use the general post office? My secretary took four huge parcels to the general post office yesterday, and she had to queue for half an hour in order to send them here by registered post. People regularly have to queue there for half an hour. It simply is not on when people in their 80s have to wait that long to access a service.

Mr. Timms: I accept my hon. Friend's point entirely, but I should point out that two post offices in his constituency—the Kirkgate and Windhill road branches—have submitted applications for improvement grants from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. Up to £50,000 can be applied for in such cases; however, the results of those applications have yet to be determined. The programme provides an opportunity to improve other branches, in order to help them to cope with the additional custom that they will receive.

My hon. Friend mentioned the delay that he suffered in being informed of the proposals, and I shall certainly ask the Post Office what happened. He said that the letter was sent to the wrong address, and I entirely sympathise with his anger at finding out about these proposals through the local press. That certainly should not happen and it is not the Post Office's intention; I shall endeavour to find out what went wrong. This may not be of much comfort to my hon. Friend, but in response to a number of problems that are not dissimilar to the ones he described, I told the House in a statement of 5 February about some changes to the consultation process. They include the requirement that Members of the House be informed one week before these proposals go out to wider public consultation. I hope that that will help to avoid other Members facing the difficulties that he has faced through finding out so late. Such changes reflect my concern that the reasoning behind the decisions being taken was not being explained as clearly as it should have been. I think that the changes announced in my statement on 5 February have helped.

My hon. Friend expressed some concerns about disabled access and the facilities in post offices. The Post Office is taking action to meet the requirements, as it has to, of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. Disability awareness training, for example, has been provided to all staff. In a number of branches, drop-down counters, electronically aided doors and mobile hearing induction loops are being installed. I understand that a number of those measures are to be taken in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Hinchliffe: There are only a couple of minutes left. One of the key points to which I wanted my hon. Friend to respond was the fundamental flaws and inaccuracies in the consultation document. The nature of the areas that the sub-post offices served was assessed wrongly. Will my hon. Friend address that point?

Mr. Timms: Yes. I am not able to explain to him how Dewsbury road was described as a rural road, given what he has said. I can only say to my hon. Friend that I will take that away and find out what happened.

I am satisfied, and certainly the experience across the country is, that Postwatch scrutinises all the proposals thoroughly and rigorously. If Postwatch concludes that the proposals are wrong—on the basis of walking around the area and having a look at it—it does not hesitate to oppose the closures that have been proposed. On this occasion, its view was that the proposals, although there were some issues that should be looked at, should not be opposed.

Let me also respond to the point about queueing times. He has tabled parliamentary questions about that with regard to the main Crown office in Wakefield. He described his secretary's experiences there recently. I understand that the office is not expected to be the main receiving branch for much of the custom migrating from the offices that will close, but Post Office Ltd will monitor the position at that office very carefully and, if it needs to, will flex the staffing times or increase the staffing hours to meet additional demand.

My hon. Friend expressed concerns about Postwatch. I say to him again that Postwatch has been vigorous and forthright. Indeed, it was the concerns articulated to me by Postwatch as well as several Members of Parliament that convinced me of the need to review the consultation arrangements urgently and led to the changes that I announced on 5 February, which I hope will ensure that problems of the kind that my hon. Friend has suffered will not occur in the future.

Like my hon. Friend, Postwatch has recognised from the beginning of the exercise that action is needed to ensure the future survival and viability of the network. It accepted that, with too many post offices competing for the same customers in many urban areas, it would not be possible to oppose every individual closure where it was clear that customers would have—

Oral Answers to Questions

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

African Cotton

1. Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): What steps he is taking to support the development of the cotton sector in west and central African countries. [164501]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Subsidies paid to European Union and United States cotton producers are one of the clearest examples of how Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development farm subsidies harm the developing world. In recent months, those subsidies have decreased world cotton prices by at least 20 per cent. As a result, many of the poorest west and central African producers struggle to make a living. We will continue to work within the international community, the European Commission and other EU member states to ensure that meaningful trade reform, particularly reform of the EU cotton subsidy regime, remains an essential part of the response to the problems faced by cotton producers in Africa.

Mr. Lazarowicz: I thank my hon. Friend for that positive response. Will his Department use its voice in the donor community to ensure that there is no suggestion of a linkage between technical assistance and development aid for cotton producing countries and their being required to drop their opposition to the subsidies from the US and EU that cause many of the problems of over-production and dumping? As it has been suggested that there should be some such linkage, can he give an assurance that the Government will oppose that?

Mr. Thomas: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance. For a demonstration of our support for the west and central African producers, we need look no further than the fact that when they brougnt their case to the World Trade Organisation meeting in Cancun last year, they did so with the support of a number of donors, including some €50,000 from the Government.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): While it is undoubtedly true that cotton growers have been badly hit by protectionist subsidy policies, particularly in the United States, is it not also the case that if they tried to add value by processing and manufacturing the cotton they would be hit again by tariff escalation and quotas, especially in the European Union? What is the Minister doing about that?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise that additional issue, which we are continuing to debate with our European colleagues in order to secure meaningful reform across the piece. As he may know, an EU-Africa cotton partnership is being worked on. Indeed, the next discussion on that agreement takes place tomorrow in the EU's Development and Co-operation Committee. That will cover not only the specific issue of subsidy, but the wider points about processing that he raised.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Is it not the case that aggregate subsidies to cotton farmers in the rich world exceed $5 billion a year, while poor cotton farmers in Africa make an average of $400 per year? Is not that an obscene inequity and should not we, as a leading nation in the field of international development, be doing much more to ensure that world trade works more in favour of cotton-producing countries in Africa?

Mr. Thomas: I agree with my hon. Friend's substantive point. It is worth flagging up the fact that some 15 million people in Africa depend directly or indirectly on the cotton sector. It is therefore not surprising that the developing countries regard the issue of cotton subsidies as totemic and want progress made in order to have confidence that the developed world is serious about trade reform. We in the UK are working hard in the European Commission with other EU member states, and on an international basis through discussions with the G20 and others, to try to achieve the meaningful progress that all Members would welcome.

Occupied Territories

2. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): What assistance his Department is giving to Palestinians in the occupied territories. [164502]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The Department provides technical assistance and financial support to the Palestinian Authority, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees, and Palestinian civil society. DFID's development programme aims to support preparation for a peace process, to make Palestinian governance and institutions more effective and accountable and to encourage more harmonised delivery of humanitarian and development assistance. DFID expects to spend £40 million on support to the Palestinians in the current financial year.

Joan Ruddock: Two weeks ago, I was in Gaza. I saw farmers whose orchards had been ploughed up by Israeli tanks, fishermen who had been deprived of their fishing rights and a whole population trapped in the equivalent of a prison lock-down. Following the UN's announcement that food aid to Gaza is to be suspended, does my right hon. Friend agree that the present Israeli policy is leading to a humanitarian crisis to which the Palestinian Authority will not be able to respond? What contingency plans does he have for such a situation?

Hilary Benn: I, too, saw the same sights when I was in Gaza last summer: I am sure that hon. Members know that 1.5 million Palestinians depend on food aid, 60 per cent. of the Palestinian population live on less than $2.10 a day and poverty has increased dramatically since the intifada. I share my hon. Friend's concern that the restrictions on humanitarian access to Gaza that the Israeli Government have introduced are a major constraint on aid and services, not only for the Palestinian Authority, which she mentioned, but for the United Nations and other agencies. We are therefore lobbying the Israeli Government hard to ensure that there is adequate humanitarian access because that is essential if the condition of the Palestinian people is not to worsen further.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): If there is to be Palestinian statehood, there needs to be an effective and accountable Palestinian Authority. Does the Secretary of State agree that one of the most essential reforms of the Palestinian Authority is that of their security services? What are the United Kingdom Government doing to assist the reform of the Palestinian security services and the provision of a security infrastructure?

Hilary Benn: The hon. Gentleman is right in identifying security as fundamental to putting the peace process back on track and to progress, which is not currently happening. As all hon. Members recognise, Israel and its people have the right to security, and many of its citizens have lost their lives. Many Palestinians have also been killed in the intifada. It is the responsibility of the Palestinian Authority to make every effort to tackle security and thus build confidence in the road map and the peace process.

Part of the UK Government's support has been for security sector reform, but the Palestinian Authority must make a greater effort and be seen to be doing that because progress on security is fundamental. Indeed, it is the key to progress on the peace process, which all hon. Members want.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): What recent discussions has my right hon. Friend held with Dr. Salam Fayyad, the Palestinian Finance Minister, about ensuring the complete transparency and accountability of all aid to the Palestinian Authority, including that contained in the presidential accounts?

Hilary Benn: Although I have not held recent discussions with Dr. Fayyad, I did so in the summer when I was in the Palestinian territories. I am sure that all hon. Members would wish to express appreciation for his work in reforming the operation of the Palestinian Authority's accounts and finances. Indeed, he has won widespread praise from all quarters for the steps that he has taken to deal with the issue that my hon. Friend raised.

Transparency, accountability and openness in the use of resources are fundamental to the effective operation of the Palestinian Authority, although we must recognise the difficult and challenging circumstances under which they work.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that agriculture, which was long the backbone of the economies of the west bank and Gaza, has been decimated in the past decade or so and that people who live in those territories receive approximately only one quarter of the water that is available to people in Israel, does the Secretary of State accept that it is essential urgently to press for a new and fairer division of water resources in the interests of both human health and agricultural recovery?

Hilary Benn: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. Problems of access to agriculture partly arise through an uneven distribution of water, to which he drew attention. It also arises from building the security barrier. In Qalqilya, I could see for myself that it encircles the town completely and that farmers find it difficult to get access to their land. Part of the UK Government's work is providing support to the Palestinian Authority through the negotiation support unit. It has been working on trying to open up and maintain negotiations on water because that, too, is fundamental to progress on the peace process.

Mr. Speaker: I call Richard Burden.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Bercow has two questions.

Mr. Bercow: If you can bear it, Mr. Speaker, I am most grateful to you.

I am also grateful to the Secretary of State for his answer. I echo his balanced and fair comments and the remarks of my co-visitor to the west bank and Gaza, the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock), but does he agree that, although Israel is entitled to defend itself, it cannot be right that the route of the security fence denies the people of Palestinian towns and villages access to their land, water, health and education services? Does he also agree that the only effect of such activity is gravely to undermine the genuine humanitarian and development efforts that he and others make in the interests of the long-suffering people of those territories?

Hilary Benn: We can always bear to listen to the contributions of the hon. Gentleman, not least on this occasion, as I can say for the second time that I agree with every word that he said. It is self-evident that the security wall, which is a symptom of the fundamental political problem, is doing to the people living in the Palestinian territories all the things that he outlined. That is why a political solution is the only way to resolve the difficulties relating to access to land, to visiting families and to getting health care, and all the other difficulties that arise because of the closures that Palestinians experience daily. The only route out of all of that is a political route, which is what all hon. Members wish to see as soon as possible.

Richard Burden: My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock), the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have all spoken eloquently of the humanitarian catastrophe unfolding in the occupied territories, which they have seen with their own eyes. Does not the real challenge for the international community involve not just what we say about these things but what we do? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the EU-Israel association agreement contains humanitarian clauses, and that, if Israel is not prepared to abide by its humanitarian obligations, we should warn it that that agreement may need to be reconsidered?

Hilary Benn: I understand my hon. Friend's point, and I know that he takes a close interest in these matters. It is, however, a matter of judgment as to whether such a step would be helpful, and the Government's view is that it would not be. I would also say to my hon. Friend that international pressure, support and interest are extremely important but, in the end, there has to be a negotiated settlement between the two parties. While we are doing all that we can to encourage that negotiation to take place, the two parties have to want it to happen. Sadly, that is what is lacking at the moment.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Does the Secretary of State agree that the best hope for development in the occupied territories is an end to the occupation and, of course, an end to terrorism? Will he confirm the Government's position on the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza? Does he agree that the proposed withdrawal would be acceptable only as part of a negotiated final agreement that would include a withdrawal from the west bank?

Hilary Benn: The proposal for the unilateral withdrawal potentially opens up opportunities, but they will depend on the basis on which it takes place and the extent to which there is negotiation and discussion, not least with the Palestinian Authority, about how it is going to be done. It is important that the Israeli Government should now clarify precisely what their proposals are, and if there is an opportunity it would clearly be in everyone's interest to take it. At the moment, it is unclear precisely what the proposals involve.

AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria

3. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to mobilise international action to combat AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria. [164503]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The Department for International Development provides significant resources through its bilateral programmes to combat AIDS, TB and malaria. We also work with a number of health partnerships, including the global fund to fight AIDS, TB and malaria, to improve the international effort in fighting those diseases and to ensure that resources are used effectively and directed to the poorest. We will use the opportunity of our presidencies of the G8 and of the EU in 2005 to push for greater international action to tackle those terrible diseases of poverty.

Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend knows as well as I do that these three killers, along with poverty, are devastating huge parts of the globe, particularly Africa. They do not simply take lives and destroy families; they also destroy economies and whole societies. Does he accept that it is in our own national self-interest to mobilise international effort to a level that we have not yet seen? If we do not take such action, we in Europe and north America will just as surely inherit the problems caused by that social and economic dislocation as Africa and other parts of the poor world will in their own right.

Hilary Benn: I agree with my hon. Friend entirely. We have both a moral and a practical duty to do all that we can to fight these three terrible diseases. One million people die in Africa each year from malaria; 90 per cent. of them are children under the age of five. TB kills 2 million people a year, and we all know the terrible statistics of the HIV/AIDS crisis. One of the instruments that we have is the global fund, into which the UK is putting $280 million up to 2008. We also need to ensure that all this international effort is used in the most effective way to support developing country Governments in tackling the scourge of those epidemics.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The Secretary of State will recognise that one of the worst cultural effects of the tragedy of AIDS is the creation, in societies in which abandoned children have been unknown, of extended families and communities that can no longer cope with the number of orphaned children that they are left to look after. Will he note the work done by agencies such as World Vision, which are trying to draw more attention to that problem, and indicate how the international community can help tackle the cultural and practical crisis caused by the number of orphaned children?

Hilary Benn: That is a serious and growing problem, not only for the generation of grandparents who are having to look after a generation of grandchildren because the generation in between is dying out. When there are not grandparents to care for the children who have been orphaned, the responsibility falls on others in the community. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the international community needs to do more. That is one of the questions that the new strategy on fighting HIV/AIDS that I intend to publish during the summer will address.

Cameroon

4. Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): What support his Department is giving to the development of sustainable forestry in Cameroon. [164504]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): The Department for International Development's support for sustainable forestry in Cameroon will be channelled through the Cameroon Government's five-year forest and environment sector programme. The programme will help to improve the Cameroon Government's capacity for sustainable forest management, increase community involvement in the management of forests, help to achieve more sustainable use of natural resources, and help to improve management of wildlife resources and conservation. In addition, we are encouraging the Cameroon Government to develop a voluntary partnership agreement with the European Union to support reforms and prevent illegal exports of timber.

Mr. Chaytor: Does my hon. Friend accept that the rain forest in Cameroon has exceptional if not unique qualities, both in terms of its biodiversity and its capacity to serve as a carbon sink to alleviate the effects of climate change? Does he agree that, although logging may bring a short-term economic benefit, the long-term economic benefit to Cameroon lies in the development of ecotourism in the rain forest? Will he ensure that his officials advise the Cameroon Government on these issues and the potential for the development of ecotourism?

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend is right that the tropical rain forest in Cameroon is a unique natural resource, but we should not concentrate only on the Cameroonian tropical rain forest. We need to recognise that it is part of a wider rain forest across the Congo basin. My hon. Friend may be aware of the initiative that was launched at the world summit on sustainable development to support forest conservation in the Congo basin forest partnership. One objective of that programme will be to support the development of ecotourism. Our programme of work to develop the capacity of the Cameroonian Government will help to support that objective.

Zimbabwe

5. Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): If he will make a statement on action being taken in response to the food crisis in Zimbabwe. [164505]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): Up to 8 million Zimbabweans face food shortages prior to the harvest in April this year. The United Nations World Food Programme is the principal distributor of food aid in Zimbabwe and is targeting more than 4 million beneficiaries. DFID pledged £5 million to the WFP for food relief in Zimbabwe in October 2003. In addition, we are providing supplementary feeding through international and Zimbabwean non-governmental organisations for approximately 1 million beneficiaries—[Interruption.] Those include households affected by HIV/AIDS, malnourished children under five, school children, displaced farm workers and other vulnerable groups. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to come to order. It is unfair to those Members who are speaking.

Mr. Breed: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. He will be aware of newspaper reports indicating that food aid is now being channelled through charities and businesses that are allies of Mr. Mugabe. I understand that he has an official investigation under way, but can he tell the House what steps he is taking with his European colleagues to ensure that conditions specifying that EU food aid must not be used by the Zimbabwean Government for political purposes are enforced?

Hilary Benn: We have discussed this in the House on a number of occasions, but I repeat what I have said before: we will not tolerate political interference with the food aid distributed by the World Food Programme and non-governmental organisations. It is very tightly controlled and monitored. That is separate from what happens to food aid distributed by the grain marketing board, which is controlled by the Zimbabwe Government.

As I have told the House before, if there is any evidence of examples of interference with the aid that we are distributing, I should be grateful if Members would bring it to my attention immediately. I shall then arrange for it to be investigated, because we have a clear and strong policy. We simply will not tolerate such interference.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): I am pleased that my right hon. Friend reiterated his firm opposition to the use of food aid for political purposes. May I urge him to be much stronger in ensuring that clarity surrounds food distribution?

The biggest tragedy of Zimbabwe, however, is that a very fertile African country cannot feed itself because it is no longer producing food. Will my right hon. Friend engage in talks with colleagues in the United Nations about increasing Zimbabwe's own food production?

Hilary Benn: There are 1,600 distribution sites where international food aid is given out. In January, four minor incidents were reported to us, all of which I understand have been resolved. But my hon. Friend is right: the tragedy of Zimbabwe lies in the fact that 25 years ago it not only fed itself, but contributed to the feeding of the rest of Africa. The present situation is a clear sign of the extent of the mismanagement of the country, and the tragedy that has been brought about by President Mugabe's rule. Now the country cannot feed itself, and that will not change until there is political change there.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Following his two earlier answers, will the Secretary of State recognise that it is Mugabe who is behind both the food shortages and the attacks on distribution centres in opposition areas? When will the Government acknowledge that quiet diplomacy has failed, and it is time to put pressure on neighbouring states—most of which are recipients of British aid—to put pressure themselves on Mugabe to stop this?

Hilary Benn: I agree with the first part of what the hon. Gentleman said, but I do not accept the premise on which he based the second part. I do not think that our diplomacy has been quiet. As he knows, EU sanctions on leading members of the regime were extended. In a very public discussion at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Abuja in December, we stood firm in supporting Zimbabwe's continued suspension from the Commonwealth, and that was eventually agreed. However, I share his view that it would be nice to hear more from other voices in Africa about what is going on in Zimbabwe. I commend Archbishop Tutu, for example, for speaking out against it—and he too has urged other Africans to follow suit.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend says, the main problem in Zimbabwe is self-inflicted and a result of the government of President Mugabe. Will he assure the ordinary people of that tragic country that we will do everything possible to ensure that they do not starve as a result of Mugabe's appalling regime?

Hilary Benn: I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance. That is why we have so far invested £65 million in the provision of food and other humanitarian aid for the people of Zimbabwe and that is why we continue to run HIV/AIDS and other health programmes in the country. The fact that the people of a country happen to have a rotten Government does not mean that the international community should abandon them.

EU Aid

6. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of financial audit of EU aid; and if he will make a statement. [164506]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Since the late 1990s, we have supported a series of reforms of EU aid programmes, which have helped to improve the effectiveness of financial audit arrangements for EU aid. They have included the establishment of a Europe aid office with an external audit unit, the establishment of an anti-fraud office, and the revision of the European Commission's financial management handbook. Further reforms are under way, such as the modernisation of accounting systems including computer systems. They should be completed by the end of next year.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As graft and corruption appear to be very much part of the EU aid programme, and as very few people ever seem to be brought to justice, will the Secretary of State and his Department take a special interest in the appalling situation in Paraguay? The EU provided aid for the digging of some water wells, but they were not dug, and the two managers ran away with £1.5 million. Will the Secretary of State report to us if they are found and brought to justice?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise that appalling example of apparent fraud in Paraguay, but I am sure that he will be reassured to hear that it is an isolated example. He will also be pleased to learn that the two co-directors of the project were dismissed immediately, and that supervision of the project is now under the direct management of the EC's delegation in Paraguay. The Commission's anti-fraud unit is conducting an investigation that will seek to recoup the missing funds to which he referred.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [164516] Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 31 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before announcing my engagements, I would like to begin by paying tribute to the police and security services for carrying out successfully a large-scale operation yesterday, resulting in arrests. As we have said, the UK and its interests abroad remain a terrorist target, and the Government and the services will continue to do all that we can to fight terrorism in every way.

I would also like to welcome specifically the letter that has been sent from the Muslim Council of Britain to every mosque in the country, condemning terrorism and making it clear that such activity has nothing to do with the true message of Islam. The threat from terrorism affects every family in this country, Muslim and non-Muslim alike, and it is right that we all work together to defeat that threat, and do not allow the extremists to divide us.

This morning I had meetings with my ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Tony Baldry: The Prime Minister should know that children's services in the Horton general hospital in Banbury are being threatened with downgrading, and that mental health care services in Banbury are threatened with closure by the strategic health authority. In Bicester, there will not now be the new and enlarged community hospital that Ministers promised us from the Dispatch Box, and the future of the existing hospital is in jeopardy. In addition, the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust tells us that it is likely to be some £40 million overdrawn next year. Will the Prime Minister take time out of his schedule to visit my constituency and discover what is actually happening in the NHS?

The Prime Minister: I will obviously look carefully into what the hon. Gentleman has said, but in his area, as in other areas, there has been a huge additional investment into the national health service. That is why we have cardiac deaths in this country down by more than 20 per cent., why we have cancer deaths in this country down by more than 10 per cent., why every single national waiting time and waiting list indicator is in better shape than in 1997, and why we have the largest hospital building programme that this country has seen since the beginning of the NHS.

I will certainly look carefully into what the hon. Gentleman says, but surely the answer must be to continue the investment that we are putting into the national health service, not to transfer it out of the health service and into the private sector, which is the policy of the Conservative party.

Q2. [164517] Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): Many disabled children have to travel long distances to attend a school with proper wheelchair access. That is discriminatory, and it leads to an extended school day and excessive fatigue for those young children. They also lose out on local friendships. Does the Prime Minister agree that all schools in England and Wales—indeed, throughout the United Kingdom—should provide disabled access so that those disabled kids can attend schools in their own neighbourhood? That would also ensure that they and their parents could play a more inclusive part in the local community, and it would save local authorities a tremendous amount of money over a number of years.

The Prime Minister: I agree in principle with what my hon. Friend says. He will know that we are trying to start such a programme, and at the moment, each local education authority is committed to ensuring that two existing schools in each local area are fully accessible. Of course, all the new schools are fully accessible. We are now committing, I think, about £100 million a year to that programme of schools access. My hon. Friend's point is absolutely right. It is important that our schools be fully accessible, and the building schools for the future programme, a huge capital investment over the next few years, should allow us to make faster progress.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): May I begin by joining the Prime Minister in paying tribute to the great professionalism of our security services and the police, who appear to have thwarted what might have been a terrible attack on London? That is yet another warning, if one is needed, that we can never relax our guard. May I also join the Prime Minister in welcoming the letter from Iqbal Sacranie, the secretary-general of the Muslim Council?

During the last month, the Government have imposed an emergency stop on immigration from Bulgaria and Romania. They have launched an in-house investigation and had to extend its remit twice. They have suspended two whistleblowers, one of whom is the British consul in Bucharest, and they have had to set up a special hotline for all other whistleblowers who want to alert the public to what is going on. Is it any wonder that everyone thinks the Government's immigration policy is in chaos?

The Prime Minister: The allegations that are now being looked into by Mr. Sutton, these most recent allegations, are a different aspect but relate to the same people who were covered in the earlier investigation. It is important, obviously, that he look at both, and at all the issues concerned, including any decisions or involvement by Ministers. He will report back and then we will publish his report.

Mr. Howard: If the Prime Minister were serious about getting to the bottom of what has happened, would he not have an independent inquiry? Does he not see that having an inquiry carried out by an official in the immigration department who reports to the Immigration Minister is not likely to inspire confidence in what is happening in our immigration system?

Let us take one aspect of this shambles. Sixteen months ago Sir John Ramsden, the head of the Foreign Office's central Europe department, wrote to the Home Office telling it that immigration procedures from Bulgaria and Romania had "developed into an organised scam that completely undermines our Entry Control procedures"—

16 months ago! Why was no effective action taken until yesterday?

The Prime Minister: These are precisely the issues that will be covered by Ken Sutton's inquiry. I am sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should cast aspersions on Ken Sutton's ability to do this. It allows us to do this quickly, it allows us to get to the truth of what has happened, and it allows us to take any action that is necessary.

I would however like to set this matter in context, because I think that is important. It is important to recognise that, according to the labour force survey, of the 1 million people who are working in this country, both self-employed and employed, who are migrants from abroad—of the top 10 categories of those people, none is from Romania or Bulgaria. The vast majority of people who are migrants here are from countries such as the United States, South Africa, France and Germany and the largest proportion by a long way are from the Republic of Ireland.

I simply say that to set this in context. A specific allegation has been made in respect of people from Romania and Bulgaria; that has to be looked into, and thoroughly. It will be, and then we will report back, and until that time we should await the judgment of Mr. Sutton.

Mr. Howard: If the Prime Minister cannot tell us of a single action that his Government took after the receipt of that letter from Sir John Ramsden, let me see if I can help him, because there was one thing that they did, after they had received the letter from Sir John. The very same month they received that letter, they relaxed the immigration procedures even further. That is what they did. If everything was under control, why does not the Prime Minister explain to us why it was necessary yesterday for the Government, in panic, to put an emergency stop to all immigration from Bulgaria and Romania?

The Prime Minister: I did not say to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that no action had been taken; I simply said that all these issues should be covered by Mr. Sutton. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has called for an inquiry; he does not like the nature of the inquiry, but he agrees with me that there should obviously be an inquiry into these issues. It is surely sensible therefore not to speculate on what has happened but to allow Mr. Sutton to conduct the inquiry properly.

Of course action has been taken. For example, just a short time ago, there were people arrested in respect of people smuggling specifically from Romania. There is also an operation that has been in place for a couple of years, one part of which is specifically referable to Romania and Bulgaria. That is Operation Reflex, which has actually uncovered many smuggling gangs and brought people to prosecution. However, all these things should be looked at and then a full report should be given to the House and to the country so that people know the full extent and scale of the problem and of the action that has been taken. That, in my view, is the sensible way to proceed, and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman truly wants a proper inquiry, he should surely not prejudge it.

Mr. Howard: I am not asking for any speculation: I am just asking for some straight answers to some straight questions. They are questions that the Prime Minister could and should have asked of Ministers. He does not need an inquiry. We know that that letter was sent and he should have found out what action was taken.

Let us take another example. James Cameron, our consul in Bucharest, wrote to the Home Office 17 months ago. He said:

"The applicants rarely know what is in their business plan, cannot speak English, and have absolutely no knowledge or experience of the type of skills needed for their respective businesses. We have to date a one-legged roof tiler . . . and a number of builders and electricians who know nothing about bricks, mortar or electrical details . . . Unfortunately against our strongest recommendations these applications continue to be approved."

Why was nothing done about that letter from the British consul?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman now says that he does not think that an inquiry is necessary. I thought that the purpose of his original question to me was to say that it was. We have asked Ken Sutton to undertake this inquiry because the same people were the subject of the original inquiry. This is to do specifically with applications from Romania and Bulgaria, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman will know the sheer scale of the problem of entry visa clearance. For example, some 300,000 people a year are refused entry visa clearance into the UK and some 50,000 are turned away at port.

Mr. Cameron has made a specific set of allegations that have to be investigated in detail and we then have to set out clearly what was done, what action was taken and whether that action fell short of what should have been done. That is precisely what Mr. Sutton will do. I would have thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have the good grace to wait until Mr. Sutton has reported before making allegations about Ministers or others.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister has to learn that he cannot avoid giving straight answers at the Dispatch Box by setting up an in-house inquiry every time something inconvenient to him is raised in the House. Three times officials have tried to raise concerns with Ministers about the chaos in our immigration system, and on each occasion nothing was done. Is that why the Home Secretary describes the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration as "first rate"? Why is it that in this Government civil servants who tell the truth are suspended, but Ministers who fail in their Departments are kept in place?

The Prime Minister: The civil servants who have been suspended were suspended by their line managers in the civil service. Those decisions—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the Prime Minister reply. It does no good to shout anyone down in this House.

The Prime Minister: As I said, Ministers do not take the decisions to suspend civil servants: they are taken by the line management in the civil service. In respect of the matters of immigration, asylum and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, let me point out that asylum applications are now running at half what they were 18 months ago and the majority of decisions are taken within two months. Let me contrast that with the position when the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who should know a little about such matters, was Home Secretary. When he was Home Secretary, asylum applications rose by almost 50 per cent. and it took an average of 18 months to take a decision. He is therefore well aware that there will be problems with the immigration system from time to time, and we have to deal with those problems. But I would hope that he would agree with me that those problems should be set in context and that we should always be careful about the language and approach we use when talking about immigration.

Mr. Howard: And we should get the facts right. When I was Home Secretary, asylum applications were reduced by 40 per cent. The Prime Minister says that they have halved—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the Government side that there will be no shouting—[Interruption.] Order.

Mr. Howard: We reduced the figures from 40,000 in 1995 to 29,000 in 1996. The Prime Minister says that the figures have halved since the high watermark of asylum applications under his Government, but despite being halved, they are still almost double what they were in 1996. Now we know how they have been cut. They have been cut by telling officials to wave through other applications on the basis of forged documents. Anyone can reduce the numbers if people are told to wave through other applications on the basis of forged and fraudulent documents. On Monday, the Home Secretary said that this was all about naked politics. Yesterday, he said that it was all very serious and profound and that he was going to suspend all applications from Bulgaria and Romania. Is it not the case that the Home Secretary has lost control of his Department, that the Immigration Minister is clearly not up to her job, and that the Government's immigration system is an utter and complete shambles?

The Prime Minister: First, I thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman became Home Secretary in 1993, not 1995.

Mr. Howard indicated assent.

The Prime Minister: Let us get that straight—I seem to remember, because I was shadowing the right hon.

and learned Gentleman at the time. Secondly, it did indeed take an average of 18 months to take a decision. Let me read out what he said at the time when probed on that. He said:

"It is absurd to suggest . . . that the problem of bogus asylum seekers is caused by the Government or by delays."—[Official Report, 20 April 1995; Vol. 258, c. 329.]

Let me especially take issue with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's allegation that asylum seekers are being waved through on forged documents. As he knows perfectly well, Bulgaria, which is where most of the applications come from, has never been a major country for asylum seekers. [Interruption.] What he was trying to suggest was that as the asylum figures have come down, they have been switched into other forms of immigration. [Interruption.] If he wants to get up and deny that, I will be happy to hear him, but I thought that that was the clear implication of what he said. [Interruption.] I am happy to accept that we are both agreed that the asylum figures are genuine and have come down by more than half. The truth is that the main countries for claiming asylum, the figures for which have come down, have nothing to do with EU accession countries.

Let me repeat what I told the right hon. and learned Gentleman a moment or two ago. It is important to deal with this. There has been a serious allegation of fraud in relation to the two countries. We will investigate it properly, as we should, and report back. The issue should be handled with care for very obvious reasons, as everyone in the House knows. I am not sure that today he has quite fulfilled that.

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr) (Lab): I commend my right hon. Friend for the amount of aid that is given to Palestine—the UK is the largest single donor to the Palestinian Authority throughout the world—to achieve a two-state solution. Does he agree that the construction of the barrier and Israeli settlement activity are increasingly seen to be jeopardising the two-state solution? The barrier, settlement, construction and road building are effectively carving up the west bank into isolated cantons, which undermines the viability of a Palestinian state.

The Prime Minister: Some of those concerns have been raised by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. The most important thing is that if we could get an offer from Israel to make a substantial disengagement from Palestinian Authority territory and put in place at the same time a robust plan for the Palestinian Authority's security, there would be just a chance—even with all the serious events of the past few weeks—that we could get the middle east peace process back up and running.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the enormous amount of work that he has done in the whole of his community, in particular in the Muslim community. I know he will agree that Palestine is an issue of serious concern for that community. There could be nothing better to improve relations than real action on the middle east peace process. That has to be done, however, on the basis that we reject terrorism in all its forms.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): It is correct to concur with the salutes that the Prime Minister paid to the professionalism of our police and intelligence and security services, and also to express gratitude for the initiative taken by the Muslim Council of Britain.

Turning to today's parliamentary business, the Prime Minister is aware that the last time we debated tuition fees, many of his Back Benchers were willing to support him in the anticipation that changes would be made to the Bill before it was discussed again. What significant concessions have the Government made during the Bill's progress?

The Prime Minister: There have been changes to all the packages, not merely since the Bill was published, but before that as well. They allow us to give a very substantial package of support for the poorest students, equivalent to the amount of the highest tuition fees. As a letter from the universities pointed out today—supported by the overwhelming majority of universities—that is absolutely vital for the poorest students, as well as middle-class students, to gain access to universities.

Mr. Kennedy: As members of the Committee will concur, the Government gave no significant concessions during the Bill's progress. How can the Prime Minister justify legislation that will undoubtedly deter poorer students from becoming university graduates because of the debt involved, which breaches trust with the public, given his earlier manifesto commitment, and which does not adequately tackle the fundamental financing difficulties of the universities themselves? He has been open enough to acknowledge that there is an alternative, which we have proposed, by which the top 1 per cent. of taxpayers pay a bit more, and as a result, we do not have tuition fees or top-up fees, variable or not. Surely that is a fairer approach.

The Prime Minister: On whether our proposals are good for poorer students, rather than the right hon. Gentleman or I being the arbiter of that, we should listen to the chairman of Campaigning for Mainstream Universities. Its universities educate the largest number of students in the UK and the majority of students from poor backgrounds. It says:

"The loss of the Bill would deny universities the urgently-needed funding to provide quality education and would cruelly remove the promised improvements in financial support for the poorest students."

Financial support for the poorest students is rising under our proposals.

At least the right hon. Gentleman has an alternative funding mechanism, unlike the Conservatives, but the problem, as I have tried to explain—I will not go over that again—[HON. MEMBERS: "Please don't."] My correspondence with him on that topic is about as intense as any I have had since I was a very young man. The fact is that the Liberal Democrat financial commitments go far beyond the commitments he keeps giving me.

Mr. Kennedy: No.

The Prime Minister: They do, I am afraid. The idea that the Liberal Democrats could fund their commitments out of top-rate taxpayers is simply wrong. As I have said to the right hon. Gentleman before, even if we could get additional sums of money from general taxpayers or top-rate taxpayers, I honestly believe that in education we would surely have to give some priority to educating the under-fives and those people who need adult skills in the work force, many of whom currently have to pay. All we are saying is that a small proportion of the overall investment in university education should be repaid by graduates, according to their ability to pay. I think that that is a fair system which most people will support.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): The Prime Minister will know that the north-west has some of the lowest turnouts at elections in the country. With that in mind, can he find any justification whatsoever for six unelected Tories blocking the chance for millions of people in the north-west to have a postal vote this summer? Does he agree that the case for reform of the House of Lords is now urgent?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is extraordinary that the other place should overrule this place on an issue to do with elections and ballots. I hope, even at this stage, that it will realise that that would be wholly wrong and completely inconsistent with the proper conventions of the House.

Q3. [164518] Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I join the Prime Minister in thanking and congratulating the police and the security services on thwarting, apparently, a major atrocity. However, many people are understandably concerned, after the tragedy in Madrid, about travelling and their safety on the railways and the underground. Yet we are still no nearer to rectifying the difficulties with the communications of the police. The British Transport police complain that they have too few trained staff to give adequate anti-terrorist cover, and future funding of the BTP is in jeopardy because of the intransigence of a couple of railway companies. Can it be right that the safety of passengers from terrorist threats relies on the profit margins of train companies?

The Prime Minister: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that that is not so. We meet any demands or requests that are made for help in relation to terrorism. That is a huge priority for our country and we must make sure that we meet it. In respect of all these different issues, we are doing our very best to protect this country against any terrorist attack. As recent events have shown, not only in Spain but in respect of threats in Germany, France and virtually every major country in the world, these people will come after us in whatever way they can. We must take every measure to protect ourselves against that. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that resource will not be a constraint in doing so.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham) (Lab): I have two questions and I do not know which one to ask, really.

Does my right hon. Friend agree with me that if the policies of the Government at the time had been similar to the policies of the present Opposition, neither the Leader of the Opposition nor I would be in the House today?

The Prime Minister: I think I will take the other one.

I am sure that that applies to the vast majority of Members, in one way or another, over the generations.

Q4. [164519] Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I announce a vested interest in putting my question to the Prime Minister? I am an honorary vice-president of the Royal College of Midwives. The right hon. Gentleman will know that the Health Committee, way back in 1992, produced a ground-breaking report on maternity services, which highlighted the vital role of midwives in maternity services. In 2001, his Government indicated that they wanted to increase the number of midwives by about 10,000. In seven years of Labour Government the numbers have increased by only 392. Will the right hon. Gentleman please give me a really good birthday present today by guaranteeing that the Government will seek to increase the numbers of midwives quickly towards that additional 10,000?

The Prime Minister: I can do something towards the hon. Gentleman's birthday present. I am told that there are nearly 900 more midwives since 1997. No doubt we can dispute these figures.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government are implementing a range of measures to recruit more midwives. These include improving pay and conditions and also—this is vital—encouraging the NHS to become a better, more flexible and more diverse employer, increasing training, investing in child care and attracting back returners. We are running both national and international recruiting campaigns. The target of 10,000 was obviously ambitious but we are stepping up action. At the recent midwifery conference on 16 March, the Department of Health, in association with the Royal College of Midwives, announced a six-point recruitment and retention plan. I know that that will have the hon. Gentleman's full support. It has our full support. Let us hope that it produces the results.

Q5. [164520] Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that I have introduced a private Member's Bill that will make it compulsory for child cyclists to wear helmets. Is he aware that, in a recent opinion poll, more than 80 per cent. of those polled agreed with the aims of my Bill? Is he also aware that my Bill is supported by 200 hon. Members on both sides of the House, including some Ministers? So will the Government give serious consideration to supporting my Bill?

The Prime Minister: We will give serious consideration to it. The issue that my hon. Friend raises is a high priority for hon. Members and the Government. As he will know, for children, our target is to reduce deaths and serious injuries by 50 per cent. by 2010. By 2002, we had already reduced deaths and serious injuries by 33 per cent.—so a large number of children have been saved from death or serious injury. Sometimes when we are talking about speed humps, speed limits, speed cameras and so on, we forget that, although those things can be aggravating for the motorist from time to time, sometimes they have a real point in relation to protecting our young people and, indeed, others. So we will certainly give careful consideration to his Bill, and if we can support it, I am sure that we will.

Dolphins and Other Cetaceans Protection

12.31 pm

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for the protection of dolphins and to prohibit pair trawling for sea bass in UK waters.

Pair trawling for bass, in which two boats tow huge nets, causes hundreds of cetacean deaths: dolphins, porpoises and small whales. Industrial trawling for bass—that is what pair trawling is—is a relatively new fishery. With no quota for bass and no limit on the number of boats that can trawl UK waters at any time, the fishery has attracted boats from across Europe. At the same time, a major marketing campaign has been undertaken to create demand for the fish and increase its price.

The sea bass dish featured in newspaper magazines, or prepared in front of the camera by the latest TV celebrity chef, may be part of a co-ordinated strategy to create a new market for a fish that, in the past, while not absent from the menus of top restaurants, was never as widely available and demanded as it is today. The side effect of such artificial demand has been witnessed on the beaches of north-west France and south-west England: hundreds of cetacean carcasses washed up on the shore.

Various cetacean species are known to die through entanglement in fishing gear. Small cetaceans, such as harbour porpoises and common dolphins, become entangled in bottom-set gill nets. Common dolphins are known to die in towed trawl nets, which may also capture species such as white-sided dolphins and pilot whales. Larger whales, such as the minke whale, occasionally become entangled in discarded nets or in the float ropes of lobster pots, sustaining injuries or long-term entanglement that may cause death through disease or infection.

Under the habitats directive, the UK has a responsibility to monitor incidental cetacean mortality wherever it is believed that such mortality could affect their populations and to take remedial action if a problem is discovered. Well, we have a problem. Sea bass, like the common dolphin, feed on mackerel. They chase the shoals during the season from Biscay to the Isle of Wight. Trawlers hunting bass drop their nets into the water and scoop up everything in sight. The dolphin chase the mackerel into the bottom of the trawl to feast, not noticing the change in water pressure. When they need to come up for air, they cannot. They are trapped. They suffocate and die, just as a human would if caught in such a net without an oxygen tank.

The dolphin fights its captivity, often damaging itself on the nets in a desperate attempt to escape. The rips and marks on the bodies of washed-up carcases are evidence of the horrific final minutes of one of humankind's closest relatives. Apart from the shocking sight that greets those who come across the dead mammals that litter our shoreline, the significant cost of disposal falls on coastal local authorities.

What we see washed up on our shores and across the channel is only the tip of the iceberg. Most of the cetaceans eventually sink to the bottom of the sea when they are thrown back by the pair trawlers. Some fishermen, recognising that the dolphin is a protected species, cut up the remains of the by-catch in the hope that it will never be discovered. However, winds and currents uncover the evidence by washing up some carcases and body parts, which can then be subjected to post mortem examination before disposal.

There is huge mortality among common dolphin in winter fisheries each year, and although the specific fisheries causing the problem remain a matter for debate for the Government, local fishermen and conservation groups know who is to blame—the sea bass pair trawlers. The only evidence of the scale of the problem currently comes from the increasing number of carcases washing up on coastlines that show evidence of trawl injuries. Some 65 per cent. of those subjected to post mortems under Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs contract were clearly by-catch victims, according to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. As a welfare organisation, the RSPCA believes that any level of cetacean by-catch carries an associated level of animal suffering that must be regarded as unacceptable.

Recorded by-catch of cetaceans in Cornwall and Devon has risen steeply since 1970. Although some of the increase may be attributed to improved reporting, the very marked shift from a roughly even seasonal distribution before 1970 to a strong predominance of winter stranding, especially in common dolphin, demonstrates another cause. The first notable peak in dolphin strandings in the UK was recorded in 1992, when 118 dolphin carcases came ashore in Cornwall and Devon in the first three months of the year. Post mortem examinations revealed that most of the animals had died as a result of incidental capture in fisheries. The pattern of injuries on the animals led to the conclusion that they had died in pelagic fisheries.

The first significant by-catch was found in the south-west in 1997, a date that coincides with the introduction of European Union fishing quotas for mackerel and pilchard. After 1997, fisheries were unable to fish for these types of fish, so instead swapped to fishing for sea bass. As of yesterday, 200 carcases had been found on the beaches of Cornwall, Devon, Dorset and Hampshire so far this year. The figures already exceed last year's total. It has taken seven years to persuade the Government that there just might be a problem. In response, a number of proposals to prevent by-catch are being funded.

Pingers, tiny acoustic alarms that are attached at intervals along a fixed fishing net to warn cetaceans of the net's presence, are designed to produce sound outside the normal hearing range of the target fish. Studies have shown that they can deter as a short-term measure, but we must ask whether the equipment is robust enough to survive constant pounding in a tough fishery at sea. Who will check, and how often, that the batteries are still working? Moreover, pingers have been developed only for set gill net fisheries. They will not work on mobile pelagic trawls.

Separator grids in fishing nets are being tested. In theory, they allow dolphin that swim into the nets to escape, but without expensive video monitoring equipment and someone to watch the screen, how will anyone on board know they are working? There is another more basic problem, which is that the catch itself may escape. If the dolphin cannot escape but the fish are escaping, that is no help to the fishermen or the dolphin.

The European Commission has prepared a draft regulation that calls for compulsory observer monitoring of fisheries with a suspected cetacean by-catch problem. Independent observers could gather information on the extent of the problem and see whether the speed of the trawl, the time of the trawl or another variable makes a difference to the level of by-catch. How many observers will be needed to monitor the increasing number of vessels engaged in that fishery, and to do so 24 hours a day, and what, if anything, can they do if cetaceans are caught?

The problem is that the trials are taking place on only a couple of UK vessels, which represent only a small proportion of the British pair trawl fleet, which in turn is one of the smallest in Europe. They represent, perhaps, 1 per cent. of pair-trawling capacity currently at work hunting for sea bass. Even if all those initiatives prove 100 per cent. successful, thousands of cetaceans will continue to be slaughtered unnecessarily.

Dolphin used to be a common sight around the coast of the west country, but they cannot sustain the annual carnage for much longer. The bottle-nosed dolphin has almost disappeared, and we do not want the common or the white-sided dolphin to follow it.

There is only one way for the House to test the claims of the pair trawlers that they are not to blame for the by-catch, and that is to ban this method of fishing for sea bass. If after a year there is no reduction in the number of washed-up carcases on our beaches, we will know that the pair trawlers are not to blame, and that the trials of nets, pingers and observers are a waste of time as well.

Time is running out, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Adrian Sanders, Andrew George, Mr. Paul Tyler, Matthew Taylor, Mr. Colin Breed, Mr. Anthony Steen, Richard Younger-Ross and Nick Harvey.

Dolphins and Other Cetaceans Protection

Mr. Adrian Sanders accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for the protection of dolphins and to prohibit pair trawling for sea bass in UK waters: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 15 October, and to be printed [Bill 87].

Points of Order

12.42 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At Prime Minister's questions today we reached only Question 5 on the Order Paper. Furthermore, the exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister took 14 minutes, which is almost half the allotted time. In the interests of Back Benchers, do you think that that is fair, and what steps can you take to ensure that that exchange is limited and that other Members of the House, beyond the Leader of the Opposition, have an opportunity to question the Prime Minister?

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to reply, he may not need to make a further point of order.

Until today, I have been lucky, because Back Benchers have done well in the recent past. In fact, I think that I have managed to reach Question 12 on the Order Paper. In fairness to the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, the questions relating to immigration were highly technical, so they took up time. I am conscious of what the hon. Gentleman has said, and there will be occasions on which the exchanges between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition are longer than usual, but I will not encourage that, and rather the opposite, I hope.

Richard Younger-Ross: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may be aware that only eight Back Benchers were selected today, and that last week and the week before we reached only Question 7 or 8. There appears to be a growing trend for the Leader of the Opposition to take an ever greater proportion of the time.

Mr. Speaker: I simply say to the hon. Gentleman: look at the big picture.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could you possibly ask the Clerks to look back a couple of decades and more, when it was quite frequent for the Leader of the Opposition to table a private notice question on a major, substantive issue? That is the way to protect the Back-Bench interest.

Mr. Speaker: Once again, the Father of the House has been able to give us some wise counsel. Perhaps that will be noticed now that it is on the record.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you make any comment about the Prime Minister's growing practice of prefacing the answer to the first question with a statement? Does that not add unnecessarily to the whole process?

Mr. Speaker: I think that we will move on to the main business, before I get drawn into criticism of either the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition.

Higher Education Bill (Programme) (No. 4)

12.45 pm

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Alan Johnson): I beg to move,

That the programme order of 27th January in relation to the Higher Education Bill shall be further varied as follows—

(1) Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the order shall be omitted.

(2) Proceedings on consideration shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following Table.

(3) The proceedings shown in the first column of the Table shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column.

TABLE

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
New Clauses relating to the general duties of the relevant authority for the purposes of Part 3; new Clauses relating to exercise by the National Assembly for Wales of functions relating to student fees and student support.	One hour after the commencement of proceedings on consideration.
Remaining new Clauses, amendments to Clauses, new Schedules, amendments to Schedules.	Five hours after the commencement of those proceedings.

(4) Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion six hours after the commencement of proceedings on consideration.

The motion will allow a full debate on the parts of the Bill on which amendments have been tabled. I look forward to listening and responding to the points that are raised, and I expect that we will continue the high quality of debate that was consistently demonstrated by representatives in all parts of the Standing Committee.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): It is surely a matter of agreement in all parts of the House that, in allocating time, it is sensible to provide the most time to the most important and most controversial legislation. There can be no doubt about the importance of the Bill. The Prime Minister himself said that it is "a very major flagship reform of the Government."

There can surely be no doubt about the controversial nature of the Bill either, given that it scraped through on Second Reading with a majority of only five. Opposition Members therefore regret that the motion will permit only four hours' debate on the most important and controversial elements of the Bill. We believe that two days should have been provided for Report and Third Reading, just as two days should have been provided for Second Reading, given that a large number of hon. Members in all parts of the House want to speak.

As far as the Bill's consideration in Committee is concerned, I agree with the Minister. I am happy to repeat on the Floor of the House what I said at the conclusion of the Committee stage. The Minister was a model of openness and candour in his deliberations in Committee, and he provided information in advance on draft regulations, genuinely answered points that were raised in the debate and listened to views expressed from all parties. He established a precedent that it would be highly desirable for Ministers to follow on all future legislation. He is right to say that we had lengthy and high-quality debates in Committee, not least because, unusually, Government Members took a full and active part throughout. I appreciate, too, the fact that, no doubt owing to decisions made by the Minister, the Government provided some additional time in Committee.

However, the Minister himself acknowledged in response to a parliamentary question that 25 clauses and seven schedules were not debated in Committee.

James Purnell (Stalybridge and Hyde) (Lab): If so many Opposition Members want to speak in this debate, how come so few of them are sitting behind the hon. Gentleman? How come the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) is not on the Front Bench?

Mr. Collins: I am sorry to have to point out to the hon. Gentleman that this is the debate on the programme motion. It had been my intention to be brief, but he is prolonging the debate. In common with many others, I want to get on to the substance of the Bill. I am more than halfway through my remarks, but if he or others wish to continue to prolong them, that is a matter for them.

The Bill has reached Report stage with large parts entirely undebated, and, as was confirmed in the exchanges in Prime Minister's Question Time, without any significant amendments having been made. Essentially, this is the same Bill to which the House narrowly gave a Second reading. We registered objections at the time—I do not intend to dwell on this point, Mr. Speaker—about the balance of the Committee. In our view, all those things strengthen the case for allocating more time, not less, in the programme motion. A large number of hon. Members in other parts of the House said—because I wish to be brief, I shall not quote them all at length—that they permitted Second Reading on the basis that the Bill would be altered in Committee. That did not happen, and we need plenty of time on the Floor of the House to examine why.

That is why the Opposition are disappointed about the allocation of time, and we will therefore oppose the motion.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I associate the Liberal Democrats with the comments made by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) and echo his remarks about the exemplary way in which Ministers dealt with the Bill in Committee. The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education and his team addressed and engaged with the core issues in an outstanding way.

The Bill will not only change the face of higher education but set the future standard for the delivery of public services throughout the country. It is important and all of it should therefore be debated properly. The significant number of new clauses and amendments on Report are worrying, and some of the issues were not aired in Committee. The debate will last for five hours, which means that a significant number of those issues will not be voted on. Over the past few days, significant time has been spent on Opposition days and Adjournment debates in the House, and that could have been devoted to the Bill. For those reasons, we oppose the programme motion.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Sometimes I read a report in Monday morning's paper of a match that I attended on Saturday and think that I went to the wrong ground, because the report is different from my experience of the event. Apart from two serious and extremely important debates in Committee, for which I pay tribute to the hon. Members for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) and for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education, in which variability and the new office for fair access were discussed at length, I must say—I do not say this lightly—that about 20 more issues were not given the serious consideration that we expect as parliamentarians. That may have been, in part, because of time, but I must say that it seemed on occasions to Government Members that filibusters were going on. I know that filibusters are out of order, so that could not possibly have happened, but there was certainly a degree of time-wasting, and I understand that tactic.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman recall which hon. Member made the longest speech in Committee?

Mr. Allen: I do not, and I would be pleased if the hon. Gentleman were to inform the House, because modesty prevents my doing so. I am sure that he will concede that that speech was made during the serious debate on variability that I have already mentioned.

If we examine the programme motion, we can see that the conduct in Committee did no one any favours. Some may pretend that proclaiming, "We did not have enough time, and we are being squeezed out" will influence thinking in the other place, but too many wise heads there realise that those who accuse others of wasting time themselves committed that offence. It is a great shame that Opposition Members chose to waste time when there are so many important issues.

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab): My hon. Friend strongly advocates modernisation of House of Commons procedures. Is there a correlation between how the Opposition handled the Bill in Standing Committee and a wider debate about programming? The Opposition filibustered in Committee, then erroneously claimed that there was not enough time for scrutiny in order to make a point about programming.

Mr. Allen: The Procedure Committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), is already examining the programming and timetabling of business, and I am sure that that matter has been brought to its attention. A number of distinguished hon. Members have already given evidence to the Committee as witnesses.

My criticism also extends to the Government, and the use of Government amendments.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend consider that he is talking in the only time available to discuss the devolved aspects of the Bill?

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend makes my point. Inadequate time has been allowed for proper debate of all the clauses, but he should not criticise those who point out the problem; he should criticise the process, in which we are all complicit, that does not allow a proper programme motion both in the House and in Committee, where there was insufficient time to discuss key issues.

If we are to have proper pre-legislative scrutiny of Bills, which is a point that Opposition Members discussed in Committee, many issues that take up Government time would not require Government amendments on Report.

Mr. Willis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Annunciator states that I have been speaking since 12.49 pm, and I would hate the record to show that I had been filibustering.

Mr. Speaker: Those of us in the Chamber know differently.

Mr. Allen: The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough made many telling contributions in Committee, and I must exonerate him from the charge that I laid against certain Opposition Members of wasting valuable time when we were Upstairs.

The question of pre-legislative scrutiny, as it applies to the programme motion, is important.

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman has now spoken for twice as long as anybody else on the subject of time-wasting. Since he has set out the reasons why the programme motion is not, in his phrase, "a proper programme motion", will he join Opposition Members in opposing it?

Mr. Allen: I will not waste the House's time by answering that question.

I have put on the record the annoyance of many Labour members of the Committee, who felt that there was not enough time Upstairs to debate many serious issues—I could list them—because of the Opposition. For example, although Ofsted applies to every nursery, primary school and secondary school in all our constituencies, universities somehow avoid it. The issue is important because we are putting billions of pounds of public funds into universities, but there are no proper inspections such as those suffered by nurseries and other parts of our education system.

I hope that my hon. Friends who follow me in this debate will not have to make the same points, and I hope that Opposition Members, particularly those who serve in the Whips Office, realise that Her Majesty's Government have done a gracious and generous thing by ensuring that a Bill has a start date and a finish date Upstairs. [Interruption.] A number of the main offenders are chirping from sedentary positions. Her Majesty's Government allowed the Opposition to use the time in Committee to best effect, and that they chose not to do so and continued to play ridiculous, time-wasting games reflects badly on Parliament as a whole, and particularly badly on Her Majesty's Opposition.

12.59 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I wish to say only one thing. We used to have a Parliament in which the Opposition had of right the power to speak; now, we evidently have a Parliament in which the Government give us that right. That is what is wrong with this Government. This is contempt of Parliament, as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) showed all too clearly.

1 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): I, too, oppose the motion. I am glad that aspects of the Committee went well, but of course not all of us were able to serve on it. It is extremely important that a higher education Bill should be properly debated, not least because such Bills are fairly rare—they come round only once every 10 years or so—and, by their nature, have several other issues swept up in them, which in this case have not been properly debated.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, you have selected a very large number of amendments. It is inevitable not only that those amendments will not be divided on if the House wishes it, but that they will not be properly responded to by the Minister. How could he possibly deal with the catalogue of amendments in the third group? That is extremely regrettable.

Finally, I oppose the motion because, as the Father of the House reminded us when he talked about the standards of 20 or 30 years ago, this is exactly the kind of Bill that used to be given two days on Report. We would have had a full day followed by two thirds of a day, or even a second full day, to allow all hon. Members to explore all the issues, as we should be doing. I understand that the House is taking substantive business tomorrow, so it would be perfectly possible for the Government now to agree that as so many amendments have been selected—they could not have known that that would happen—the debate should continue tomorrow.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Having served on the Committee opposite the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), I cannot recognise his description of it. He said that only two serious debates took place, but I remember him putting the case for his constituency, in what I took to be a serious way, in many more than two debates. I listened to all his speeches, some of which were longer than others, and thought that they were all serious; I do not know which were the non-serious ones. As far as I am concerned, the Committee gave serious consideration to the Bill, but there was not enough time then, as there is not enough time now. The limited allocation of time—six hours to debate all the issues—means that it is impossible for the whole House to have its say. Many of our constituents will think that a crying shame.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I acknowledge that the Government were flexible in Committee, and I think that we had enough time to go through the Bill. On occasion, some of that time could have been better used by all Members, but that is true of all Committees. My beef with the programme motion is that we do not have enough time for proper debate on the Floor of the House.

This is an important Bill that changes the face of higher education and affects the whole cohort of the young generation whom we are seeking to support in achieving the Government's targets, which I support in principle. It is therefore right and proper that we have enough time to debate it in detail. Specifically, the first group of amendments includes several that relate to Wales tabled in the name of the main Opposition party. If we do not debate them, we will not address on the Floor of the House—although I accept that we did in Committee—the Welsh aspects of the Bill, which are important in relation to what the National Assembly does, how that may differ from what is done in England, and the impact that that might have on English students or students from Wales going into England.

Such a Bill should not be timetabled at all when it is debated on the Floor of the House, but we should at least have two days to consider it properly. Even at this stage, it is worth saying those words to give the Government the opportunity to listen to them and perhaps even think about them.

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Alan Johnson): I want briefly to respond to a couple of the points that hon. Members raised. I thank Opposition Members for their kind and generous remarks. Their comments reflect the spirit in which they approached the Committee, on which it was a pleasure to serve.

Let me say a few words about the Committee. The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said, correctly, that we did not reach 25 of the clauses. However, the Bill is quite short, with only 50 clauses. The hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) harked back to a previous time—I am not sure how long ago—but in my experience, and from my experience of watching Parliament under the previous Government, it is not unusual to spend this amount of time on a 50-clause Bill. As regards the clauses that we did reach in Committee, the debates on fees provision, which lasted for seven sittings, or a total of 11 hours, principally concerned the big issue of fixed fees versus variable fees. The debate on the office for fair access, which is extremely important, particularly to Conservative Members, and very controversial, lasted for a further three sittings.

Of the clauses that were not debated, 10 covered technical, interpretive and commencement provisions. Amendments were not tabled to several other clauses, so it is not surprising that we did not debate them. The debates were wide-ranging, and those on a number of clauses—notably fees, as I said—spanned a few sittings. If I remember rightly, the Opposition wanted 16 sittings, and we just about achieved that.

As for today's debate, I was surprised that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis)—who should now be renamed Phil O'Buster—remarked on the absence of amendments passed in Committee; indeed, the leader of his party raised the same point in Prime Minister's questions. I remind Liberal Democrat Members that one of their amendments was accepted in Committee, to great rejoicing throughout the land—it added to the gaiety of the nation—and that a Government amendment was also passed.

We have put the right emphasis on issues relating to fees and student support. Although there is a large number of amendments, many are consequential and relatively few deal with substantive proposals. That justifies the time that we have allocated in the programme motion, which I hope that the House will support.

Orders of the Day

Higher Education Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

GENERAL DUTIES OF THE DIRECTOR

'(1) The Director must perform his functions under this Part in such a way as to ensure full access to higher education based upon academic ability and potential.

(2) In performing his functions under this Part the Director shall also have regard to—

(a) the desirability of promoting equality of opportunity in connection with access to higher education,

(b) the requirement to maintain the independence of the procedures for the admission of students of individual institutions, and

(c) the desirability of securing that his powers are exercised in such a way as to impose the minimum necessary burdens of cost and compliance with regulation on institutions.'.—[Chris Grayling.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.21 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 2—General duties of the relevant authority in relation to Wales—

'(1) The relevant authority in relation to Wales must perform his functions under this Part in such a way as to ensure full access to higher education based upon academic ability and potential.

(2) In performing his functions under this Part the relevant authority in relation to Wales shall also have regard to—

(a) the desirability of promoting equality of opportunity in connection with access to higher education,

(b) the requirement to maintain the independence of the procedures for the admission of students of individual institutions,

(c) any guidance given to it by the Assembly, and

(d) the desirability of securing that his powers are exercised in such a way as to impose the minimum necessary burdens of cost and compliance with regulation on institutions.'.

Amendment No. 1, in page 14, line 6, leave out Clause 30.

Amendment No. 2, in clause 48, page 22, line 13, leave out '30(1)' and insert

'[general duties of the Director]'.

Amendment No. 3, in page 22, line 44, leave out '30(2)' and insert

'[general duties of the relevant authority in relation to Wales]'.

Amendment No. 99, in schedule 5, page 31, line 33, at end insert—

'(2A) In any report under sub-paragraph (1) the Director shall include an assessment of the factors which most discourage any particular class of person from seeking access to higher education, in particular factors related to income.'.

[Mr. Speaker]

Amendment No. 100, in page 31, line 33, at end insert—

'(2A) Any report by the Director may include recommendations for public policy.'.

I rise to speak to new clause 1 and the other consequential new clause and amendments, tabled in the names of my right hon. and hon. Friends and me. Four years ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer began a process of Government interference in our universities that will, if the Bill goes through, establish the mechanism for the Government to dictate to them how they should select students. We all remember the case of Laura Spence, the applicant from the north-east who was turned down by Oxford university and subsequently admitted to Harvard. For some reason—and with what seemed like precious little knowledge of the detail of the case—the Chancellor thought that it was his job to come to Laura Spence's defence.

I have been looking back at the coverage of the case, and the events, and their consequences for our debate are clear. A report in The Times of 26 May 2000 stated:

"Gordon Brown embroiled the Government in a class war with Oxford University yesterday by attacking its "old school tie" interviewing system and the "absolute scandal" of the rejection of a comprehensive schoolgirl.

The Chancellor urged Britain's older universities to open their doors to "people from all backgrounds" after Laura Spence failed to secure a place to read medicine at Magdalen College. She has since won a Harvard scholarship.

Mr. Brown spoke with the full backing of Tony Blair . . . But he was promptly criticised by the university, whose Vice-Chancellor, Dr Colin Lucas, accused him of speaking without knowing the facts behind the headlines."

That is not entirely a surprise. The real message in that story was in the last paragraph, which stated:

"Last night the row was escalating as government sources made plain that universities could face sanctions if they fail to take more state pupils. 'These people have got to put their house in order', a senior government source said. Oxford and Cambridge have already suffered a cut of £11 million over ten years in the money previously allocated for college tuition fees. Officials say there is plenty of scope to impose further funding conditions."

Further funding conditions are precisely what are on the table today. They are forcing those people, in the eyes of the Government, to put their house in order. Our new clause and the related amendments seek to challenge that intervention, and to ensure that unwarranted political interference by the Government cannot happen.

James Purnell (Stalybridge and Hyde) (Lab): In answer to a question that I asked in the debate on the programme motion, the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said that there were hordes of Conservatives waiting for the end of that debate so that they could speak in this one. Can the hon. Gentleman explain why there are only three Conservative Back Benchers supporting him now, given the earlier claim that there was massive interest on the Conservative Benches in this important Bill?

Chris Grayling: I hate to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but I think that he will find that much of the interest in speaking today is on his own Benches, where large numbers of people are only too keen to speak against the Government's ill-thought-out approach to higher education. The sad thing is that all too few of them will have the opportunity to do so—if, indeed, they have not already been cowed into submission by the intense efforts of the Government Whips Office.

It has been noticeable in recent weeks that some supporters of the Prime Minister have, perhaps with his retirement in mind, started to talk about "Blairism" as a political philosophy, although I am not sure whether that is a contradiction in terms. This measure is not about Blairism; it is about Brownism, and it is a sign of things to come if the country should ever be unfortunate enough to see the Chancellor move house from No. 11 to No. 10. The fact that the measure is before the House today is also a sign of just how weak the Prime Minister has become within his own party, and just how strong the Chancellor has become.

When I challenged the Prime Minister on this issue a year ago, he disowned his Government's own policy. I said to him:

"There are increasing reports of pupils of high ability and achievement being turned down by universities because of their social background. How would the Prime Minister justify that to the people who are losing out?"

The Prime Minister's response was:

"The simple point is that I would not. If universities are doing that, they are wrong. What is more, people should go to university based on their merit, whatever their class or background. That is what should happen."—[Official Report, 26 February 2003; Vol. 400, c. 256–7.]

The purpose of new clause 1 is to ensure that it does happen, and if the Government are so enthusiastic for it to happen and if Ministers are so keen on it happening, I suggest that we stop the debate now so that they can accept new clause 1 and we can move on. Would they like to do that? [Laughter.] No, I thought not.

New clause 1 would write into the Bill the simple principle that the access regulator should be mindful of academic achievement and potential, and of that alone. That is where the Conservatives stand on this issue. Only those two factors should be taken into account when deciding who should go to university. The admissions system should not become a system for social engineering.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Has the hon. Gentleman had time, since the Bill was in Committee, to consider what he means by "potential"? Can he now give the House a better explanation of what he means by that term, and of what his objection is to fair access, which is something else that he could not get to grips with in Committee?

Chris Grayling: I suspect that the difference between the hon. Lady and me is that, as a politician, I do not think that it is my job to define "potential". I would rather leave it to the professionals in the universities to decide which young people have the potential to succeed. They do not need politicians to step in and do their job for them.

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is something wrong with a system in which, over the last 50 years, no more than 15 per cent. of people from C5 backgrounds have gone into higher education? Is he saying that the vast majority of such people—of whom I represent many—do not have potential?

Chris Grayling: The hon. Lady makes an important point, but she should be looking elsewhere in the education system to deal with those very real issues. It is not a solution to gerrymander the higher education entrance system.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Speaking as someone who was a professional lecturer for six years in the kind of institute that encouraged wider access, may I emphasise to the hon. Gentleman the unseen potential of people who come to higher education through non-traditional pathways? It is not a desirability but a necessity to ensure that such people have equal access to all higher education institutions, because they outperform people who come through with more traditional grade scores.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman makes my point for me. He talks about his own experience in higher education and the role that he and his colleagues clearly played in selecting students with academic potential. It is the job of his colleagues who are still in the profession to take those decisions; it is not for politicians to impose those solutions on them.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Chris Grayling: No, I want to make some progress, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me. The point is that it is exactly that principle that the Government are seeking to destroy today, and we want to prevent that from happening through our new clauses and amendments.

The proposal to introduce the access regulator represents all that is wrong with this Government. University vice-chancellors have told us that they hope that the regulator will prove to be a paper tiger, but they should have listened to the Minister when he spoke in a debate on the subject in Westminster Hall earlier this year. He said that "this is a regulator with teeth."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 6 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 32WH.]

Our goal this afternoon is to draw those teeth, and to establish the principle, which should be inalienable, that these matters should be outside the control and involvement of politicians.

Let us be clear: we believe that entry to university should be based on academic achievement and potential and on nothing else. It is not for politicians to interfere in this.

1.30 pm

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): The hon. Gentleman may recall from Committee that my position is somewhere between his and the Government's on this matter. There is a serious point to be made: the university funding system is already subject to an element of political interference. The Higher Education Funding Council for Wales, for example, already sets a threshold for the number of applicants who must come from the 100 most deprived communities in Wales. Would the new clause weaken existing arrangements, or does the hon. Gentleman think that he is merely tackling the office for fair access? I am a little concerned that he may weaken efforts already being made in relation to access to higher education.

Chris Grayling: I see no reason why the new clause would have that effect. Nor do I believe that our universities would be enhanced by another layer of bureaucracy, which would make it more difficult for them to do the job that many of them are already doing.

The important point at the heart of this debate is that there is a need to create opportunity within our education system for those who are let down by it. There was no dispute in Committee about that, and there is no disagreement that there are young people who do not achieve what they could under our current education system. There are young people with the potential to go to university, who, for family or other reasons, such as the social environment in which they are brought up, do not end up doing so. That is wrong. There is agreement on both sides of the House about that.

In Committee, the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who is sadly not in his place at the moment, made an impassioned and important speech—and quite a long one—about the situation in his constituency, where anyone who stays on in education after the age of 16 is regarded, in his words, as weird. Clearly, that is wrong. I did not disagree with his analysis of the situation in his constituency, nor with the fact that it needs to be addressed, but I fundamentally disagree with him about the solution. The problem that the access regulator is being appointed to tackle is deep-rooted in our schools, and it is there that the change must come. That solution will not be found by gerrymandering the university admissions system, or by requiring university admissions tutors to follow anything other than their natural instincts and expertise in judging academic achievement and potential.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman also recall that we heard in Committee of examples of universities and schools working together in communities, such as that of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), to expose universities to young people who had no previous experience of them? The regulator will oversee exactly that type of access extension.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right and anticipates the next section of my speech.

The frustrating irony of the debate about the access regulator is that good work is already going on in the university sector to try to attract students from non-traditional backgrounds.

In Committee, numerous Labour Members praised the efforts of their local universities in this regard. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), who is not in her place today, said:

"Cambridge University has long been generous in providing bursaries to students from low-income backgrounds"

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North said:

"we need . . . vice-chancellors to become far more a part of the education family".—[Official Report, Standing Committee H, 4 March 2004; c.464–71.]

[Chris Grayling]

But he went on to praise the work done by his two local universities, Nottingham university and Nottingham Trent university, in seeking to extend opportunities for 14 to 16-year-olds.

Jonathan Shaw: It is right that we gave examples of good practice in Committee, but we also said that it was not uniform, it was not across the piece, and that some universities were doing very well, and others were not. We want all universities to perform to their best in terms of widening access and reaching out into communities to young people who would not have thought about attending university. That is what the regulator will do: it is about spreading good practice.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman must understand that the fundamental difference between us is that we do not believe that we should pass laws to do that. One does not legislate best practice; one encourages it. The flaw in this measure is the belief that passing a law is the right way to deal with a genuine problem. That is the difference between Conservative and Labour Members.

Kali Mountford: I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises the hard work going on in junior and primary schools as well as in secondary schools and universities. Alongside that good work, does he not recognise that there is a problem with people following their natural instincts, to use his words? Is not the problem that some people's natural instincts may not be benign, and some people's natural instincts may need some encouragement in a more generous direction?

Chris Grayling: If the hon. Lady is right, and if the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) is correct that there are potential students out there who will out-perform in higher education, by definition, those institutions that are good at recruiting them will rocket up the academic ladder, and others will realise that they are missing out. Surely best practice is best developed in that way, rather than through clumsy bureaucratic laws from the centre.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Chris Grayling: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I want to make some progress. I do not want to take up the whole debate with my contribution.

The problem is that when the Government feel that something is not right, they rush to pass a law. Although the natural instincts of Labour Members to nationalise everything have long been curbed, those instincts are still to look to interfere in every aspect of our lives. When there is something with which they do not agree, passing a law is their only solution. The introduction of an access regulator, whose job is to ensure that universities are pressurised into changing the way that they shape their future intakes, is based too much on class prejudice and not enough on academic good practice. We do better if we empower people to take those decisions themselves, rather than trying to be prescriptive from the centre.

I agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North that something must be done to address those failing schools and communities where education is an alien concept—[Interruption.] He has just returned to the Chamber, and he missed my remarks referring to his speech. I very much agreed with his diagnosis of the problem in his constituency. My point is that that problem simply should not exist in a modern society in 2004. It behoves all of us as politicians to seek ways to address it. We differ not on the aspiration but on the solution. Fundamentally, we do not believe that passing laws is the right way to do it. Nor do we believe that creating potentially draconian regimes for the university sector is the right way to do it.

Chris Grayling: I am going to conclude my remarks, as I want to allow other Members the chance to speak.

The Government have sought to assure us that they have no intention whatever of trying to become involved in admissions. The measure, they tell us, is all about applications, not admissions. They just want universities, they tell us, to cast their net wider. The problem is simple: we do not believe them. They have form in this area. They know that they have already gone back on a clear manifesto pledge on tuition fees, to which we will no doubt return later this afternoon.

When the Government tell us that the access regulator will have a light touch and confine his interest to a loose set of guidance in relation to the application process, I do not believe them. Do we honestly believe that two or three years down the road, if by some unhappy accident they are still in office and their goals are not being met by the higher education sector, they will stand aside if the changes that they want have not happened? No one in the higher education sector should be under any illusion about that. When the Secretary of State talks about substantial financial penalties—£500,000 fines for universities that do not conform—that is a threat to be taken seriously. In time, those threats will become a harsh reality.

There is a simple way of removing this threat. The new clause would limit the ability of the regulator to impose a social engineering agenda on our universities. It would ensure that our universities cannot be forced to admit students on the basis of any factors other than academic achievement and potential. The Prime Minister had it right a year ago when he said that anything else would be wrong. He was right then, this new clause is right now, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): I shall not detain the House, because I am sure we all want to proceed to the next group of new clauses and amendments.

The Liberal Democrats will support the new clause, because, as we have said from the outset, we consider the whole system of targets to be nonsense. The idea that precisely 50 per cent. of young people—no more, no less—should go to university is absurd. The target will probably be achieved quite easily anyway; it has already been achieved in Scotland, and the chances are that it will be achieved in England in the near future regardless of whether the Government take any action. What we should be doing is deciding how many university places we ought to be providing, and for whom they ought to be provided. We have long believed that places should be provided for all who have the ability, potential and qualifications to make proper use of university courses.

We are particularly happy with new clause 1 because the Conservatives, who in Committee tabled an equivalent amendment proposing the removal of the clause in the Bill that insists on fairness, have now included subsection (2) in the new clause. It provides that the system of choosing between applicants must be fair and non-discriminatory. That addition makes all the difference: it enables us to support the new clause.

While we are thinking about fairness, we should bear in mind that A-levels are not the only measure of ability and potential. I was somewhat surprised, but nevertheless delighted, to find in Committee that the Conservatives held that view as well. There had been some concern about the issue over the past year. Some independent schools had seemed to think that A-levels were the only important measure of ability, and that those with the right A-levels should be chosen on those grounds alone. That, of course, has become impossible in the case of our most prestigious universities: so many applicants are achieving three or four A grades that it is impossible to choose between them purely on that basis.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): While we are discussing the central issue of enforcing fairness, may I make a point about Oxford university? I should mention that I went there from a state school. Oxford accepts a proportion of applicants from state schools, but it is also true that more people from state schools will end up with better degrees—the corollary being that those from the private sector will end up with worse degrees. Does that not imply that something is going badly wrong at the margin, and that there should be more factoring in of social backgrounds? That is the job of the regulator, and it should be enforced.

Mr. Rendel: I do not think that those from state schools necessarily get better degrees. What is certainly true is that those from state schools who have lower A-level grades tend to do at least as well as those from independent schools who have higher grades. I do not think that that is quite the point that the hon. Gentleman was making, but it is my reason for thinking that A-level grades should not represent the only way of choosing between applicants. If we do not have other mechanisms, our most prestigious universities will not have the opportunity to admit applicants with great ability and potential who come from state schools and whose A-level grades may not be as good as those of others in their age group.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): I think that the hon. Gentleman has misinterpreted my hon. Friend's point. The other side of the picture is that when people who have been carefully nurtured and groomed, and on whom an enormous amount of money has been spent in the private system—who have been glossed up—reach university, the glossing up does not persist. It gets them into university because they look good at their interviews and have plenty of self-assurance—and yes, they have achieved three As at A-level—but when confronted with the rigours of a university degree course, they do not perform as well as people from state schools with similar qualifications.

Mr. Rendel: I suspect that, in fact, we are all misunderstanding each other. I think that what I was saying is exactly what the hon. Gentleman has just said. Those from state schools will not necessarily get better degrees than those from independent schools, but those from state schools with lower A-level grades tend to end up with the same degrees as those from independent schools with higher grades.

1.45 pm

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman join me in commending to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman)—the Chairman of the Select Committee—and to the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Geraint Davies) a report prepared for the Higher Education Funding Council? It concerns the effects of schooling on higher education achievement, and concludes that the difference in the degree performances of students with the same A-level scores from independent schools and state schools is very small indeed at the most selective and highly academic universities such as Oxford and Cambridge.

Mr. Rendel: I think that we are all saying much the same thing, and that I should now make some progress.

At present, independent schools are selling themselves largely on their ability to produce better A-level grades than state schools for pupils with the same ability. Universities should therefore take the opportunity of choosing state school applicants with lower grades, rather than those from independent schools; but the choice must be made on the basis of a number of criteria. Past exam success clearly makes a difference, and it is one of the measures that universities can use fairly—not just in respect of A-levels, but in respect of earlier exams. Current tests of potential along the lines of the American SATS are a possible method of differentiation. The application form itself may give universities a hint, and pupils could perhaps send examples of written work to show what they had achieved in the past. Interviews are another possibility, as are teachers' assessments. If teachers are at all fair in their assessments, the best way of judging the ability and potential of young people may be what is said by those who have known them best at school.

New clause 1 would, I hope, produce a fairer way of choosing university students than the methods currently used in some universities. It is only fair to add, however, that a certain level of resources would have to be invested. It is quickest and simplest for universities to choose between applicants on the basis of A-level grades; if these more complex and subtle—but fairer—methods are adopted, universities must put in more money than they do at present.

New clause 2 would remove from the Welsh Assembly some of its rights to determine how university admissions are handled. That clearly conflicts with the whole principle of devolution to the Assembly. I should like the maximum number of powers to be devolved, and I believe that these powers should be included.

Chris Grayling: As the hon. Gentleman will know, new clause 2 is effectively consequential on new clause 1.

[Chris Grayling]

Is he saying that he supports the principle that universities should not be subject to political interference in England, but does not apply that principle to Wales?

Mr. Rendel: No, I am not suggesting that Welsh universities should not have a fair choice of applicants. What I am saying is that it should be up to the Assembly to determine how it will put pressure on universities to employ a fair and sensible way of discriminating between applicants. We in this Parliament should not make that decision.

I am not sure whether anyone will speak to amendments Nos. 99 and 100. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who tabled them, did not seem to want to speak a moment ago. In case he does speak, however, let me say that we consider the amendments unobjectionable but probably superfluous. I suspect that OFFA would work more or less in that way in any event. We see no great need for the amendments, but we have no great objection to them.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): New clauses 1 and 2 are important, because they give the House the chance to look very seriously at OFFA. In this context, I must allude to some remarks that I made earlier about Ofsted. Unfortunately, my new clause, which would have made OFFA into a body more like Ofsted, did not get the attention of the Speaker, but new clauses 1 and 2 bring to the House's attention the strength of OFFA. The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) made some telling points when he spoke earlier, but I disagree with him on the strength of OFFA. If we are to intervene effectively in what is an education market whether we like it or not—whether we would like to reshape it or not, and whether it is imperfect or not—we need the tools to do so. We had a good debate on how people can assess the market and adjust it for the benefit of all participants. OFFA is one of the instruments that could be used to make an imperfect market a little more perfect.

Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that the use of the word "market" has heavy political and social implications, especially for Labour Members. Although he accepts that there is now a market in higher education, does he agree that neither the current situation nor that proposed in the Bill will by any means produce a free market? The market is extremely restricted and contained, so that term must be used with the caveat that we do not, and will not, have a free market.

Mr. Allen: The pretence that there has ever been a wholly free market—which is a theoretical concept—is an offence to logic, but it is equally an offence to logic to pretend that we do not currently have a highly distorted market. The problem is that if we want to clean it up and to use the language of the market, people unfortunately bring to the discussion a lot of emotional baggage about what that means.

The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell kindly alluded to my remarks in Committee on how a distorted market affects my constituency. Nottingham, North sends the fewest young people to university of any constituency in the United Kingdom. The people in Nottingham, North are not congenitally thicker than people elsewhere, but their life chances are perverted at an early stage because the market of brains, ability and talent is not allowed to work. The way to solve that is not to preserve the current system in aspic, but to take on the market, make sure that it works effectively and remove as many of its imperfections as possible.

One tool that we can bring to bear on that process is OFFA. Unlike the hon. Member for Epson and Ewell—on occasion I have disagreed with Ministers, too, on this—I feel that OFFA is not the tiger that we need, but something of a pussycat.

Jonathan Shaw: If we all agree that admissions are the sole responsibility of the institution, what additional powers does my hon. Friend advocate that OFFA should have?

Mr. Allen: I shall gladly explain my request, but my hon. Friend will be bored because he heard it all in Committee. We have heard from Opposition Members, whose view is honest and sincere, that we need a light touch, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education has taken that further by saying that we should have a light touch but not a soft touch. However, I think that we need a slightly firmer hand on this particular tiller. Statistics tell us that over the past 40 years, working-class kids' chances of getting to university have not improved one jot. There are still only 20 per cent. of working-class kids, and fewer in my constituency, who make it to university. I do not want to rush into legislation, to use the term of the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell, but concluding a 40-year experiment is not rushing. The need to ensure that the talent that is out there is allowed to breathe, and that talented young people realise their full potential, is long overdue. People whom we represent feel that it is long overdue, as does our party.

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend knows of my admiration for what he is doing in Nottingham, North to put right what has been wrong for far too long in terms of opportunities for children. However, does he agree that in the period since 1997, we have had the right strategy of intervening as early as we can, with Sure Start, free nursery places, and massive investment in primary, junior and secondary schools and in education maintenance allowances? All of us will agree that in one sense, 18 is too late. We must make the intervention earlier.

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench repeat over and over, rightly, that the subsidy for education, which everyone in this country should be proud of, is far higher at the latter end of education than at the earliest moment. I pay great tribute to my hon. Friend the Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee for repeatedly renewing calls on Sure Start, on all our schemes to improve emotional intelligence and social behaviour before school and on the effort to bring literacy and numeracy into play at primary school. When those measures were introduced, none of them found much favour from Opposition Members, but Ministers pushed them through with the support of my hon. Friends on the Back Benches, and they are starting to make a real difference.

I repeat that the life chances of young people in my constituency and in the constituencies of many colleagues are not falsified at the age of 18; the dice are loaded from birth, and sometimes before. We need to examine a much wider picture and ensure that the money goes in at the earliest possible opportunity. If youngsters are allowed to flourish prior to going to school—we have all read primary school Ofsted reports from difficult parts of our constituency—they will benefit massively from the education on offer. That is how we must look at this particular question, and we must ensure that the process is pursued right up to the age of 18, through an OFFA with teeth.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Given how my hon. Friend described his constituency and his constituents, does he think that they would agree with the wording of new clause 1, which describes equality of opportunity as desirable? Would he choose a stronger form of words?

Mr. Allen: I would choose far stronger words, and I did so in Committee. I still hope that the Government might consider my proposal. OFFA is essentially a reactive body. If we look at the way in which it was created through the consultative paper, and the way in which we talked about it in Committee, we see that OFFA is reactive to whatever universities propose in their access plans. However, I want OFFA to make proposals, to be innovative and to tackle some of the problems and their causes, just as we would expect any other body related to educational institutions to do. If Ofsted goes into one of my local primary schools, it comes out and produces not just a bland report on achievement but a sharp report on what is needed in that school, and on how to support teachers and end the problems that have caused under-attainment. Similarly, I want action-oriented proposals from OFFA.

I know that we have had to compromise to get parts of the Bill through, but we must return to that matter at an appropriate point. That is why one of my amendments in Committee referred directly to a proposal of the Chairman of the Education Committee, which has done such superb work in this field. Although it was able to undertake only brief, if comprehensive, pre-legislative scrutiny of the provisions, one of its proposals was that we review the operation of OFFA and see whether we can take it further and give it more teeth, so that we can assess how the problems are being tackled, rather than just providing a snapshot of those problems. I hope that the Minister will take up that idea informally, even if it is not passed as an amendment to the Bill.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I do not think that anybody in the House would disagree with the premise that the hon. Gentleman is putting forward—that generations of young people in many constituencies have been denied access to higher education as a result of low expectation, and often as a result of low standards in local education authorities and schools. We both start from that point. What worries me about his language is the idea that, in a constituency such as mine, where about 70 per cent. of young people enter some form of higher education, those very young people should be penalised as a result of their efforts and the fact that many of them have been born into lower or middle-class families. Does he agree that it should not be a question of either/or? We are not seeking to replace certain groups of students with others. That is what worries us about the whole issue of social engineering within this framework.

Mr. Allen: Of course it is not a question of either/or, but let us be absolutely clear about this: social engineering is already happening, and we need to recognise it. There is already a market, and we need to recognise that. If we think that the current market is imperfect, which it is, and if we agree that the current social imbalance, which certainly exists, has not arrived by accident and is wrong, we need to do something about those things. The pertinence to the new clause is that OFFA potentially gives us a way to strengthen the teeth that will allow talent to flourish—not to give anybody an easy ride, not to give anybody access to university who does not have the qualifications, but to ensure that the abilities that are out there are allowed to flourish. It is a way of freeing up the abilities, not forcing people into university. In many ways, the hon. Gentleman is setting up a straw man, because the people who would like that the least would probably be those who were forced into a university when they knew perfectly well that they were not qualified. I accept that he was not intending to say that.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: I accept the genuine interest and expertise of the Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesperson on this issue, but does my hon. Friend share my concern that, over the past 40 years, social engineering has kept able, bona fide candidates out of higher education, as is evidenced by the fact that for 40 years only 20 per cent. of people from lower socio-economic backgrounds entered higher education?

Mr. Allen: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. Labour Members should stop being defensive about the idea that intervention takes place in a market. That is exactly what this party is about, if we are about anything. The Conservatives practised intervention for decade after decade to the benefit of the people whom they represent. I do not quibble with them for doing that, but Labour Members must accept that, as John Smith used to say repeatedly, a market is a good servant but a bad master. By using methods such as those that OFFA will use, we can intervene to ensure that the market is properly regulated so that talent is allowed to flourish.

I return briefly to the point that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) made. We do of course need to take a comprehensive view of the whole issue. For that reason, I implore my hon. Friends, whatever their views on particular aspects of variability, to vote with the Government tonight. If things do not go as I hope that they will, we might lose the other part of this vital package. The key is to ensure that, now that we have a higher education system in which youngsters can flourish, we allow them to get there.

[Mr. Allen]

The biggest problem faced by young people is not the prospect of paying back a fiver a week when they are on £18,000, or £25 a week when they are on £30,000, as a graduate; the biggest obstacle to kids in my patch, and in the constituencies of hon. Members on both sides of the House, is their fear that if they go to university with no money in their pocket, they will be unable to keep body and soul together. I have already written to the eight secondary head teachers in my constituency to tell them that, if the Bill is passed, they should spread the good news at their assemblies and other places and say, "You can go to university and we will pay you £3,000 to do it, because that is available"—

Mr. Willis: And charge them.

Mr. Allen: And they will not be charged. The hon. Gentleman repeats that assertion over and again. It needs to be refuted, even if it is only made from a sedentary position.

Mr. Willis rose—

Mr. Allen: I must answer the hon. Gentleman's sedentary point, and then I may give way to his standing point.

The scare that is put about that poor students, poor families, rich students or rich families will have to pay back under this scheme, is nonsense. It will be graduates earning a wage—earning £18,000—who will start to pay back at £5 a week, and those earning £30,000 will pay back £25 a week. What the hon. Gentleman does—he does it so often that I begin to doubt that he is doing it inadvertently—is frighten the very youngsters in my constituency whom I want to grasp this opportunity. It is an easy point; it is an easy misrepresentation. This morning I met a number of people who have lobbied us in the House. I corrected them, and they were amazed because they had swallowed the propaganda and thought this was a great debt burden rather than a very modest repayment that will be made only once graduates earn sufficient repay.

Mr. Willis: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that poorer students currently pay no fees, so when they leave university they have to pay back their maintenance loan, whereas under the new system they will get a £3,000 grant, including the bursary, as they go into university, but they will have a £3,000 tuition fee to repay at the end? So they will actually get a grant of £3,000 and then have to pay back £3,000 in fees. How on earth is that an advantage?

Mr. Allen: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on almost every particular. I wish that I could take more time to refute the arguments that will be made in the later debate. I will be present in the later debate to do that, as I did repeatedly in Committee. Not every youngster will pay a £3,000 fee—[Interruption.] I am sorry, not every university will charge—

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your protection. How can you help Members who represent Wales in the House, who, it is now clear, will have no opportunity to debate the important issues, which are currently non-devolved, about how the Bill affects Wales? In its ignorance or with its disinterest, the House is about to legislate on Wales without allowing any Member from Wales to speak on that issue. Can you do anything to protect our interests?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I understand the points that the hon. Gentleman is raising, but the House has decided the programme motion that we are now working under, and as far as I am concerned in the Chair I have no control over that.

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) makes a strong point, and all that I can say to him is that this matter was covered extensively in Committee. I know that is of little consolation to him—

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I have enjoyed listening at great length to my hon. Friend. Given the length of his contribution and in recognition of his efforts, OFFA should perhaps be renamed the Allen key to improve access.

Mr. Allen: I believe that several colleagues wish to speak and I shall bring my remarks to a close. I simply emphasise that we are creating an instrument for intervention in a highly imperfect market, and we should give it the necessary teeth. Unfortunately, this will not be the opportunity to do that, but I hope that perhaps under the auspices of the Select Committee we shall revisit this matter and ensure that OFFA is a regulatory body worthy of the name.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) has just taken a third of the entire debate. I shall certainly be briefer, not least to try to allow some Welsh Members into the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) described amendment No. 1 as consequential. It may be, but I think that it also reflects amendment No. 268, which he tabled in Committee, in that it removes from the Bill the clause that allows the Secretary of State to give guidance to the regulator. That is the issue that most concerns me, because it allows the Secretary of State to give the regulator guidance, so the regulator will not be independent of the Secretary of State or of Government.

One can make a case, when dealing with rail, water or other issues, for the regulator to be directed or guided by the Secretary of State or the politicians of the day, but higher education is not the same as energy, water or railways. On the contrary, universities—even if Labour would wish it otherwise—are not public institutions. They are private institutions, and what is studied at universities and those who are admitted to them should, in the final resort, be matters for universities themselves. That is the principle of academic freedom, which I have yet to hear addressed, on Second Reading or today.

Peter Bradley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fallon: No, I have very little time.

The Minister was brutal on that point in Committee. When he answered the debate on amendment No. 268, he said that the Government wanted the powers because "we want to direct the regulator."—[Official Report, Standing Committee H, 4 March 2004; c. 523.]

He made no bones about it: he wants the powers so that the Secretary of State can direct the regulator.

We have heard today Labour Members say—as they are entitled to do—that they want a regulator with teeth. Indeed, that was the gist of the 20-minute speech by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North. That is fine, but the Bill will mean that we will have a regulator with the Government's teeth. It is wholly wrong of the Government to interfere in the operation of the regulator.

I shall lay my cards on the table and confess that I do not think that we need a regulator. Better practice could be spread in different ways, and there is no case for a regulator. However, if there is to be one, it should be independent of the Government and of the Secretary of State. It should carry out its duties, subject—of course—to the law and perhaps to review by the courts, but free from political interference.

Jonathan Shaw: The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) rightly said that we do not want an either/or situation: we want to promote the opportunities for young people from working-class backgrounds to fulfil their potential and gain access to higher education institutes. We have heard a lot of scaremongering from the Conservatives about what OFFA will do, but the idea that it will involve social engineering is ridiculous—[Interruption.] I am sorry that the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) greets that with incredulity. OFFA will, with a light touch, spread good practice to ensure that institutions reach out to communities that are less well represented in higher education. OFFA will not be a punitive weapon that the Secretary of State can use, and that suggestion was clearly rebutted in Committee—and the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) knows it. The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) nods, but we remember the language that he used. He said that OFFA would be used if the Secretary of State took offence at an institution and that he could use OFFA in a vendetta against it.

The Opposition said that OFFA would be the Secretary of State's plaything, but that is ridiculous. Universities UK has been clear about the powers that OFFA will have, especially on the plan that will allow universities to charge fees of £3,000. If the plan is altered, it will be on the say-so of the institutions, not OFFA. It is important that OFFA is not involved in admissions, but the Conservatives want people to think that it will be. The universities know that OFFA will not be involved in admissions, the Labour party knows that and so do the Liberal Democrats. Indeed, the Tories know it, but they choose not to articulate it because it does not suit their opportunism. They constantly use emotive words, talking about social engineering, to create a pernicious impression.

2.15 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): I support the principles in the Bill, which is why I will not vote against it tonight, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that the provisions on OFFA are a cause for concern? The best universities want to try to broaden access: the problem is that only a quarter of 18-year-old A-level entrants get two decent A-levels. We have to find other ways, but that is not what OFFA will be set up to do.

Jonathan Shaw: One in four youngsters from working-class backgrounds who get good GCSEs do not go on to higher education institutions. Perhaps if those institutions reached out, they might get on the radar of those youngsters. We will pile more money into universities and it is reasonable for a light-touch regulator to try to ensure that they reach out. Some of our universities do a fantastic job, while others do not do such a good job. If universities want to raise their fees, they will have to reach out as the best do.

Mr. Simon Thomas: If OFFA were to be established, would any student of adequate or good financial means from a middle-class background find it difficult to go to university? I find it hard to conceive that that would ever be the case. It is also pertinent that while universities are independent, they rely heavily on public funding. Therefore, we have the right to ask something in return for that funding.

Jonathan Shaw: I agree. The judgment that we have to make is the extent of that intervention. The proposals in the Bill are reasonable. A series of amendments in Committee have assured Universities UK that OFFA will be light touch. It will also spread good practice and, together with other measures—not least at nursery level—it will improve access for young people

Mr. Clappison: In the unfortunately short time left, I shall be brief. I support the amendments tabled by my hon. Friends and I also support in their entirety the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon). He was right to draw attention to the lack of independence of OFFA. It will be the creature of the Secretary of State and will act under his strict statutory guidance. Hon. Members should ask how OFFA will work under that guidance, because there will be a clear link between admissions and finance, and that is very disturbing.

My hon. Friend was right to refer to the £500,000 fine that can be imposed on universities, but whether universities are allowed to impose a variable fee will depend on the approval of OFFA. Whether they get that approval will depend on whether they carry out the activities required under the access agreement. The key point of how they will be judged on whether they are achieving the targets on outreach will be admissions—[Interruption.] Whoever said "No" should read the statutory guidance, which sets it out in black and white.

Chris Grayling: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have two minutes before the guillotine falls, and clearly the House would like to hear the Minister's response to the debate. Have you received any representations from the Government that they might be minded to extend the guillotine under the programme motion? We would be happy to support such an extension.

[Chris Grayling]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Such things are not possible at this stage of our proceedings and would simply take more time from the debate.

Mr. Clappison: For the reasons that I outlined, OFFA is inconsistent with admissions based on merit. That will create a sense of injustice for many individuals, and might well lead to the lowering of standards in universities. It could result in a large number of this country's students going to universities in Germany—we have heard about that today—and perhaps the United States because they cannot obtain a place at a university in this country. They will be joined by those for whom a vast burden of debt will create a disincentive. I shall finish to allow the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) the chance to make his point on Wales, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Peter Bradley: I have been to Wales.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) put on the record the Tory view that democracy is an unhappy accident. It is no doubt also his view that broadening access to university will happen only through an unhappy accident. He says that there is a problem with widening access, and new clause 1 says that it is desirable to promote equality, but his solution is to do nothing except to trust the instincts of those in charge of admissions policies, although they have failed over the years to do anything more, for example, than to lead Oxford and Cambridge to admit people from lower-income groups to 10 per cent. of their places. OFFA is necessary not only to help to develop outreach strategies, but to ensure that they make the difference that will be absolutely essential if the Bill is to have any meaning.

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 5

ABOLITION OF TUITION FEES CHARGEABLE TO QUALIFYING STUDENT

'(1) This section applies to fees charged by a relevant institution in respect of a qualifying course in connection with the undertaking of that course by a qualifying student.

(2) No fees to which this section applies may be charged in respect of any academic year unless regulations under section 22 of the 1998 Act (new arrangements for giving financial support to students) make provision in the case of all qualifying students for authorising a grant in respect of that academic year to be paid directly to the relevant institution the amount of which is equal to the amount of the fees.

(3) In this section—
"academic year", in relation to a course, means an academic year applicable to the course;
"qualifying course" means a course which is—

(a) a designated course within the meaning of the student support regulations, and

(b) provided by an institution in England within the meaning of section 62 (7) of the 1992 Act;

"qualifying student" means a person who is of the class specified in Schedule 1 to the student support regulations other than—

(a) persons who are not eligible for support under the student support regulations by reason of regulations 4(2) of those regulations, and

(b) persons who are not eligible for a grant for fees under the student support regulations by reason of regulations 10(2) of those regulations;

"relevant institution" means an institution specified by the Secretary of State in a condition under section 68(1) of the 1992 Act or section 7(1) of the 1998 Act;
"the student support regulations" means the Education (Student Support) (No. 2) Regulations 2002 (S.I., 2002/3200).'.—[Mr. Collins.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 6—Condition by English funding bodies in relation to fees of prescribed amount—

'(1) A condition under this section requires the governing body of the relevant institution—

(a) to secure that, in respect of any qualifying course, the qualifying fees in respect of any academic year which begins during the grant period at a time when an English approved plan is in force in relation to the institution are equal to the prescribed amount,

(b) to secure that, in respect of any qualifying course, no qualifying fees are charged in respect of any academic year which begins during the grant period at a time when no English approved plan is in force in relation to the institution, and

(c) to comply with the general provisions of any English approved plan that is in force in relation to the institution during any part of the grant period during which it is in force.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)—

(a) an academic year which begins at the same time as the grant period is to be taken to begin during the grant period, and

(b) an academic year which begins with the day on which an English approved plan comes into force is to be taken to begin at a time when the plan is in force.

(3) A condition under this section must provide—

(a) in the event of a failure by the governing body to comply with the requirement specified in subsection (1)(a)—

(i) where the qualifying fees are equal to the prescribed amount, for the imposition by the funding body on the governing body of any financial requirements required by a direction under section 35(1)(a), and

(ii) where the qualifying fees exceed that amount, for the imposition by the funding body on the governing body of any financial requirements required by a direction under section 35(1)(a) and of other financial requirements determined by the funding body in accordance with principles specified by the Secretary of State in the condition under section 22,

(b) in the event of a failure by the governing body to comply with the requirement specified in subsection (1)(b), for the imposition by the funding body on the governing body of financial requirements determined by the funding body in accordance with principles specified by the Secretary of State in the condition under section 22, and

(c) in the event of a failure by the governing body to comply with the requirement specified in subsection (1)(c), for the imposition by the funding body on the governing body of any financial requirements required by a direction under section 35(1)(a).

(4) Any financial requirements imposed by virtue of subsection (3) must relate to one or more of the following—

(a) the repayment, with or without interest, of the whole or any part of any sums received by the governing body in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question,

(b) the withdrawal or reduction of any amount that has been awarded but not yet paid in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question, or

(c) the refusal to award (or to award to the extent expected) any other grant, loan or other payment under section 65 of the 1992 Act or (as the case may be) section 5 of the 1994 Act in respect of the grant period or any subsequent period.

(5) Where—

(a) a condition is imposed under this section in connection with any grants, loans or other payments made to the governing body of a relevant institution, and

(b) those payments are to any extent made in respect of persons undertaking a course which is provided in whole or part by any other institution, then, for the purposes of this section, fees payable by such persons to the other institution are to be regarded as fees payable by them to the relevant institution.

(6) The first regulations to be made under subsection (11) prescribing the prescribed amount shall prescribe a single amount, except where subsection (8) applies, in which case a lower amount may be prescribed.

(7) The Secretary of State may not make the first regulations under subsection (11) prescribing the prescribed amount unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.

(8) This subsection applies where the qualifying fees are for—

(a) the final academic year of a course where that academic year is normally required to be completed after less than 15 weeks' attendance;

(b) a sandwich course where during an academic year any periods of full-time study are in aggregate less than 10 weeks;

(c) a course of initial training of teachers, including such a course leading to a first degree, where during an academic year any periods of full-time study are in aggregate less than 10 weeks;

(d) a course provided in conjunction with an overseas institution where during an academic year the periods of full-time study are in aggregate less than 10 weeks;

(e) a sandwich course or a course provided in conjunction with an overseas institution where the periods of full-time study at the institution in the United Kingdom are 10 weeks or more, but in respect of the academic year and any previous such academic years the aggregate of any one or more periods of attendance which are not periods of full-time study at the institution (disregarding intervening vacations) exceeds 30 weeks.

(9) Where regulations under subsection (11) have been made prescribing the prescribed amount no regulations under that subsection may be made increasing that amount unless the Secretary of State is satisfied that the increase is no greater than is required to maintain the value of the amount in real terms.

(10) For the purposes of subsection (9) the Secretary of State is to have regard to such index of prices as may be specified in, or determined in accordance with, regulations made by him under this subsection.

(11) In this section—

"academic year", in relation to a course, means an academic year applicable to the course;

"funding body" has the same meaning as in section 22;

"the grant period" means the period in respect of which the grants, loans, or other payments to which the relevant condition under section 22 relates are made;

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State;

"the prescribed amount" means the amount prescribed by regulations in accordance with this section;

"qualifying course" means a course of any description prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"qualifying fees", in relation to a relevant institution, means the fees payable to the institution by a qualifying person in connection with his undertaking a qualifying course;

"qualifying person" means a person falling within any class of persons prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"relevant institution" has the same meaning as in section 22.'.

New clause 7—Condition by Higher Education Funding Council for Wales in relation to fees of prescribed amount—

'(1) A condition under this section requires the governing body of the relevant institution—

(a) to secure that, in respect of any qualifying course, the qualifying fees in respect of any academic year which begins during the grant period at a time when a Welsh approved plan is in force in relation to the institution are equal to the prescribed amount,

(b) to secure that, in respect of any qualifying course, no qualifying fees are charged in respect of any academic year which begins during the grant period at a time when no Welsh approved plan is in force in relation to the institution, and

(c) to comply with the general provisions of any Welsh approved plan that is in force in relation to the institution during any part of the grant period during which it is in force.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)—

(a) an academic year which begins at the same time as the grant period is to be taken to begin during the grant period, and

(b) an academic year which begins with the day on which a Welsh approved plan comes into force is to be taken at a time when the plan is in force.

(3) A condition under this section must provide, in the event of a failure of the governing body to comply with any of the requirements specified in subsection (1), for the imposition by the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales on the governing body of financial requirements determined by the Council in accordance with principles specified by the Assembly in the condition under section 25.

(4) Any financial requirements imposed by virtue of subsection (3) must relate to one or more of the following—

(a) the repayment, with or without interest, of the whole or any part of any sums received by the governing body in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question,

(b) the withdrawal or reduction of any amount that has been awarded but not yet paid in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question, or

(c) the refusal to award (or to award to the extent expected) any other grant, loan or other payment under section 65 of the 1992 Act or (as the case may be) section 5 of the 1994 Act in respect of the grant period or any subsequent period.

(5) Where—

(a) a condition is imposed under this section in connection with any grants, loans or other payments made to the governing body of a relevant institution, and

(b) those payments are to any extent made in respect of persons undertaking a course which is provided in whole or part by any other institution, then, for the purposes of this section, fees payable by such persons to the other institution are to be regarded as fees payable by them to the relevant institution.

(6) In this section—

"academic year", in relation to a course, means an academic year applicable to the course;

"the grant period" means the period in respect of which the grants, loans, or other payments to which the relevant condition under section 25 relates are made;

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Assembly;

"the prescribed amount" means the amount prescribed by regulations in accordance with this section;

"qualifying course" means a course of any description prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"qualifying fees", in relation to a relevant institution, means the fees payable to the institution by a qualifying person in connection with his undertaking a qualifying course;

"qualifying person" means a person falling within any class of persons prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"relevant institution" has the same meaning as in section 25.'.

New clause 8—Condition that may be required to be imposed by English funding bodies (No. 2)—

'(1) A condition under this section requires the governing body of the relevant institution—

(a) to secure that, in respect of any qualifying course, no fees are payable to any relevant institution by any qualifying person, and

(b) to comply with the general provisions of any English approved plan that is in force in relation to the institution during any part of the grant period during which it is in force.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)—

(a) an academic year which begins at the same time as the grant period is to be taken to begin during the grant period, and

(b) an academic year which begins with the day on which an English approved plan comes into force is to be taken to begin at a time when the plan is in force.

(3) A condition under this section must provide, in the event of a failure by the governing body to comply with the requirement specified in subsection (1), for the imposition by the funding body on the governing body of any financial requirements determined by the funding body in accordance with principles specified by the Secretary of State in the condition under section 22.

(4) Any financial requirements imposed by virtue of subsection (3) must relate to one or more of the following—

(a) the repayment, with or without interest, of the whole or any part of any sums received by the governing body in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question,

(b) the withdrawal or reduction of any amount that has been awarded but not yet paid in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question, or

(c) the refusal to award (or to award to the extent expected) any other grant, loan or other payment under section 65 of the 1992 Act or (as the case may be) section 5 of the 1994 Act in respect of the grant period or any subsequent period.

(5) In this section—

"academic year", in relation to a course, means an academic year applicable to the course;

"funding body" has the same meaning as in section 22;

"the grant period" means the period in respect of which the grants, loans, or other payments to which the relevant condition under section 22 relates are made;

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State;

"qualifying course" means a course of any description prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"qualifying person" means a person falling within any class of persons prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"relevant institution" has the same meaning as in section 22.'.

New clause 9—Condition that may be required to be imposed by Higher Education Funding Council for Wales (No. 2)—

'(1) A condition under this section requires the governing body of the relevant institution—

(a) to secure that, in respect of any qualifying course, no fees are payable to any relevant institution by any qualifying person, and

(b) to comply with the general provisions of any Welsh approved plan that is in force in relation to the institution during any part of the grant period during which it is in force.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)—

(a) an academic year which begins at the same time as the grant period is to be taken to begin during the grant period, and

(b) an academic year which begins with the day on which a Welsh approved plan comes into force is to be taken to begin at a time when the plan is in force.

(3) A condition under this section must provide, in the event of a failure of the governing body to comply with any of the requirements specified in subsection (1), for the imposition by the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales on the governing body of financial requirements determined by the Council in accordance with principles specified by the Assembly in the condition under section 25.

(4) Any financial requirements imposed by virtue of subsection (3) must relate to one or more of the following—

(a) the repayment, with or without interest, of the whole or any part of any sums received by the governing body in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question,

(b) the withdrawal or reduction of any amount that has been awarded but not yet paid in respect of the grant, loan or other payment in question, or

(c) the refusal to award (or to award to the extent expected) any other grant, loan or other payment under section 65 of the 1992 Act or (as the case may be) section 5 of the 1994 Act in respect of the grant period or any subsequent period.

(5) In this section—

"academic year", in relation to a course, means an academic year applicable to the course;

"the grant period" means the period in respect of which the grants, loans, or other payments to which the relevant condition under section 25 relates are made;

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Assembly;

"qualifying course" means a course of any description prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"qualifying person" means a person falling within any class of persons prescribed for the purposes of this section;

"relevant institution" has the same meaning as in section 25.'.

Amendment No. 12, in page 33, schedule 7, leave out lines 34 to 36.

Mr. Collins: We come to the heart of the Bill. There is only one place that the debate can commence, and that is with the words:

"We will not introduce 'top-up' fees and have legislated to prevent them"— the clear, categorical, unequivocal manifesto pledge on which all Labour Members were elected and which their Government are proposing to strong-arm them into breaking.

New clause 5 and various amendments in this large group attempt to draw out the issue of fees. The new clause would prevent the introduction of top-up fees and tuition fees. Let us consider some of the views expressed about the proposed legislation by outside organisations—[Interruption.] We will come to universities, as the Secretary of State seems to be saying something about them.

The British Medical Association

"strongly opposes the introduction of top up fees for any students, including medical students."

The Secretary of State and others will no doubt say that they are introducing the fees to raise money in part to pay for university lecturers and university employees. The National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education has said:

"Critics of the Bill should hold their ground."

It goes on:

"We know that when the lid comes off fees, all hell will break loose."

The Association of University Teachers opposes the proposals.

The Secretary of State and Labour Members—or at least some Labour Members—may claim that the package on offer is in the interests of students and that they should welcome it. Presumably they believe that the National Union of Students has organised today's lobby at the House to say how delighted it is with the Government's proposals. I have to disillusion them: it is here to encourage hon. Members to vote not in support of the Bill, but against it.

The NUS has helpfully compiled considerable evidence from overseas on the attitude of students in other countries. We heard much in Committee, as we have at other times, of the Government's proposals for top-up fees modelling those in other countries, and of how the glorious successes and widespread popularity of what has been introduced in Australia, New Zealand and elsewhere would be eagerly welcomed in the United Kingdom. The NUS has been in touch with its equivalents around the world, and that is not what they say.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Collins: I give way to the hon. Gentleman, who will no doubt know about legions of students who support his Government's proposals.

Mr. Plaskitt: The new clause would remove the funding stream from universities. In Committee, the hon. Gentleman was unable to tell us how his party would replace that funding stream. Can he tell us now?

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman is right in his characterisation of the new clause: it would prevent fees. There is no doubt about that; that is its intention and that is what it would achieve. He is also correct that it is the duty of Opposition parties to produce alternative proposals on how that vital funding for universities would be provided. We will do that, and we will do that earlier in this Parliament than the Government produced their final proposals on the subject in the last Parliament. The difference is that, whereas three months before the last general election the Labour party produced the final proposals that it now plans to breach, we will produce proposals earlier in the life-cycle of this Parliament, which we will implement on coming into office.

James Purnell rose—

Mr. Collins: I give way to the hon. Gentleman, who, in a former capacity, may well have had a role in writing the manifesto, which he is cheerfully about to breach.

James Purnell: On the hon. Gentleman's policies, will he confirm that the envelope has been set for funding those policies by the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), and that that is a cash freeze and therefore a real-terms cut in higher education funding? If the extra money that will come from tuition fees is to be removed, how will the hon. Gentleman do anything other than cut quality and student numbers?

Mr. Collins: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman was one of those who was disappointed when he found that the Opposition's proposals on the pupil passport did not turn out to be what he had hoped and expected it to be. He will be extremely disappointed when he learns of our proposals on higher education; I urge him to wait for them. We are debating the Government's proposals, which are in clear breach of the manifesto on which he stood at the general election.

The Conservative party made exactly the same pledge at the last election. We are keeping our promises and the hon. Gentleman is breaking his. Playing party political games will not help him explain to his constituents why they should believe anything that he says at the next general election, given that he has so cheerfully broken his word from the last one.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): Does the grand total of nine Conservative Members on the Opposition Benches accurately reflect the commitment of the hon. Gentleman's party on this issue?

Mr. Collins: Our attendance accurately reflects the eagerness of Opposition Members to allow Labour Members the maximum time for debate. We fully expect them to express more than one view, shall we say, on their happiness to break their manifesto pledge.

Peter Bradley: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman reached the end of his list of expert witnesses. What does he have to say to the Campaign for Mainstream Universities? Its statement today reads:

"The loss of the Bill would deny universities the urgently-needed funding to provide quality education and would cruelly remove the promised improvements in financial support for the poorest students. This would damage the sector as a whole and would be particularly damaging to the Government's aims of widening participation and social exclusion."

That message is borne out by Universities UK. What does he have to say about that?

Mr. Collins: It is true—it has been throughout the debate—that the majority of vice-chancellors support the Government's proposals. They are the one and only category of people who do so. The hon. Gentleman should understand that there has been a shift of opinion in the vice-chancellor community in the past few months—from unanimous support of the Government's position to a significant number expressing profound opposition to their proposals.

Peter Bradley rose –

Mr. Collins: No, I will not give way; I am responding to the hon. Gentleman's point. He wanted to talk about the attitude of vice-chancellors, so we will talk about that. Let us consider the attitude of Professor Gillian Slater, the vice-chancellor of Bournemouth university, who said:

"We don't have faith that the cap of £3,000 will not be raised very quickly indeed".

That is what she believes, and it is what many other vice-chancellors believe. She was one of 15 vice-chancellors, alongside 12 university lecturers, who wrote to The Guardian yesterday to express their opposition to the centrepiece of the Government's legislation. I make no pretence of the fact that the majority of vice-chancellors support the Government's proposals. However, they are the only category of people who have taken that position, and even they are not unanimous. All other organisations, including the Association of University Teachers, the National Association of Teachers, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education and the National Union of Students, are opposed to the Government's proposals. If all the hon. Gentleman can do is say that about 90 vice-chancellors like the proposal, when 55 million people are opposed to it, bring on the election.

I was going through the important comments that had been brought to the attention of the House by the NUS as a result of its consulting its opposite numbers in other countries, on which the Government have modelled their proposals.

2.45 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): From the point of view of a vice-chancellor, is there any more plausibility in the Government's assertion about the firmness of their cap of £3,000 on tuition fees than there was about the Labour party's assertion before the last election that it would not introduce top-up fees? If those assertions are equally valid, does my hon. Friend think that the majority of vice-chancellors welcome the breach of the Government's undertaking or are appalled at it?

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend makes an important point. No doubt we shall consider the Government's minor concessions on the extent to which their word on the £3,000 cap should be taken. The entirety of the Government's concessions amount to this: "It would require primary legislation, taken through both Houses of Parliament, for us to breach our solemn pledge not to raise top-up fees above £3,000." What is this Bill if not primary legislation designed to breach a clear manifesto pledge? I am at a loss to understand why the Government should think that that should impress Labour Back Benchers or anybody else.

Mr. Clappison: In the spirit of the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), does my hon. Friend recollect that, in its manifesto, Labour not only promised not to introduce top-up fees but said that the Labour Government had legislated to prevent them?

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The second sentiment of that part of the Labour party manifesto is particularly interesting given the Government's attitude to amendment No. 128. The Government's line is that the amendment would remove the cap and allow universities to charge any top-up fees that they liked. Unfortunately, there is such a thing as the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998, which was so important that it was mentioned in the 2001 Labour party manifesto. It enabled the Government to say in the manifesto that they had legislated to prevent top-up fees. That legislation, by which they set such store at the last general election, remains on the statute book, and it is therefore an entirely spurious argument that amendment No. 128 would remove the cap and that universities could charge whatever they liked.

I see that the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mrs. Fitzsimons) is in her place. Given her present and former capacities, I am sure that she will be delighted to know that the co-president of the New Zealand University Students Association is named Fleur Fitzsimmons.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: That is a good name.

Mr. Collins: Perhaps it is. Fleur Fitzsimmons points out that the introduction of the scheme in New Zealand, which the Secretary of State says is in part the model for the proposals, has been "an unmitigated disaster ... Fees act as a significant barrier to participation. The increase in debt has forced a fifth of medical graduates overseas."

We hear similar stories in Canada.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Collins: I mentioned the hon. Lady, and I promise that I will give way to her in a moment, once I have finished this point.

We hear that, after 10 years of tuition fees in Canada, fees have jumped by an average of 99 per cent. That reflects precisely the fears expressed by students, the British Medical Association and even some vice-chancellors: once we start on the route of top-up fees, there will be strong, steady and substantial increases. That is justified by the very overseas experience to which Ministers try to turn our attention.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: My name is Fitzsimons, which is different from Fitzsimmons; anybody who could spell would recognise that. I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman exchanges assertions for facts. Does he accept that, year on year between 1997 and 2000, the participation of students from lower socio-economic backgrounds in New Zealand rose from 18 per cent. to 26 per cent? The number of Maori students—who, typically, are less advantaged and in lower socio-economic groups—rose by 46.1 per cent. between 1994 and 2000. I think that that is pretty impressive, does the hon. Gentleman not think so?

Mr. Collins: I apologise if I was wrong about the hon. Lady's name. I am delighted that she has made it abundantly clear that she regards New Zealand as a model for what the Government are seeking to do, because it has been reported in New Zealand that, after the introduction of precisely the sort of scheme that is proposed for this country, the result was as follows:

"Students from the richest schools are five times more likely to attend university than students from the poorest schools."

It has further been demonstrated that fees have impacted on where students have decided to go to university. New Zealand students therefore continue to oppose top-up fees, and I suspect that, if the hon. Lady was still an NUS office holder in this country—let alone running to become one—she might take the same attitude as all the current NUS office holders take.

Jonathan Shaw: Can the hon. Gentleman tell the House how many universities there are in New Zealand?

Mr. Collins: It was the hon. Member for Rochdale who said that New Zealand is a great model. I take the view that it is sensible to consider what is sensible for the United Kingdom and what UK organisations do. It is not the Opposition who have been saying, "Let's imitate New Zealand"; it is the Government and Labour Back Benchers, so the hon. Gentleman is only undermining his own side. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw) must contain himself. There is little point in asking a question and not listening to the answer that is given.

Mr. Boswell rose—

Mr. Collins: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Boswell: I am afraid that I cannot illuminate the House on the precise number of universities in New Zealand. One of the reasons why I cannot do so is that I cannot recall, when I was the Higher Education Minister in 1994 and the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mrs. Fitzsimons) was the president of the NUS, her ever coming to me, saying, "The New Zealand approach is exemplary and we should follow it."

Mr. Collins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention.

I was going through the list of organisations in the education sector that do not support the Government's proposals. Dr. John Brennan, the chief executive of the Association of Colleges, has said:

"After 2010, the Bill as it stands allows universities an essentially unlimited ability to increase tuition fees. We believe this freedom will seriously compromise the chances of young people from working-class backgrounds to attend certain universities."

As I said earlier, 15 vice-chancellors wrote to The Guardian yesterday to say that Government's measures would

"disadvantage the majority of students".

So I am afraid that it is simply not the case that the majority of those in the education sector enthusiastically endorse the Bill. On the contrary, the majority of those who work in education and the organisations that represent students are clearly, unequivocally opposed to the Bill and have called on Labour Members to stand by their manifesto pledges.

Peter Bradley rose—

Mrs. Fitzsimons rose—

Mr. Collins: I shall give way to the hon. Lady, because I have given way to the hon. Gentleman already. [Interruption.]

Mrs. Fitzsimons: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned me a tiny bit more than he has mentioned my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley), but there is time. I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way again, but he makes assertions about my leadership. It is on record that, when I was president of the NUS, I believed that students would have to pay and that we wanted the money to be end-loaded, so that we could increase the maintenance grant. As for what the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) said about lobbying when I was president of the NUS, we were comparing a loans system introduced by his colleagues under which it would have been cheaper to give students the money than to administer the system, rather than comparing a variable system, which is what we are discussing now

Mr. Collins: It is very interesting that all those former presidents of the NUS believe that they can speak more for the interests of students than the current president of the NUS. I thought that I had made a flippant comment earlier, but Labour Members clearly believe that all those students have come to lobby Parliament today in support of the Government's legislation. I suggest that they go out to listen to them if that is what they believe.

Since the hon. Lady makes an important comparison about the cost efficiency of measures, let us consider the cost efficiency of the Government's proposals. To raise slightly less than £1 billion a year for universities, the taxpayer will have to spend about £1.2 billion. That does not strike most of us as remotely cost-efficient. In fact, it is an extremely inefficient way to proceed. That arithmetical link—the fact that it will cost the taxpayer about £1.25 for every £1 raised for the university—is clearly even more of a problem if, as is widely expected in the education sector, the £3,000 a year cap is only temporary and will be removed shortly. So the taxpayer will have an even worse deal as time goes on.

One of the most important aspects of the whole debate is the Government's assumption, which they have often repeated, that graduates will almost universally end up in a massively strengthened financial position compared with non-graduates. The figure of a £400,000 premium in lifetime earnings has been bandied around. That is simply not borne out by the latest evidence that is coming to light. Many hon. Members will have seen the report in The Times this Monday about a forthcoming book by Philip Brown of Cardiff university and Anthony Hesketh of Lancaster university, both of whom are leading political economists. They point out that even three years after completing their studies, 40 per cent. of recent graduates are in jobs that do not require degree-level skills. Their survey indicates that average starting salaries for graduates are falling. They have analysed American data—an example that Labour Members often cite—and they seriously query the Government's assumption that 80 per cent. of all new jobs will require degree-level qualifications. Ministers often cite the United States as an exemplar of graduate participation that we should follow. American data apparently show that just 20 per cent. of American workers—not 80 per cent.—make use of degree-level education.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Very interesting information has been quoted and some of us would want to make use of it, but do the Conservatives therefore now entirely reject the road that they initially went down with the Education (Student Loans) Act 1990, which introduced the principle of student debt, and thus the problems of people being able to continue in education?

Mr. Collins: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those comments. It is, of course, common ground among all the parties represented in the House that student loans remain the best way to provide for maintenance. They are not ideal, but no party proposes to get rid of student loans that underpin maintenance. The hon. Gentleman takes a different view, but he has not managed to persuade his Front-Bench colleagues about the issues. The view of both the Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties on that angle is that student loans should continue. We are talking about the principle of fees to pay for teaching itself. New clause 5 would strike out such fees, and we believe that the House would be very sensible to support that.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman for a considerable time. The new clause is about abolishing fees altogether. However, as a former university teacher, I should be delighted if he could tell me how the Conservative party would find the money if not by introducing fees. This is an important debate, and it is right that the House is fully informed of the Conservative policy.

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman basically repeats a question that one of his hon. Friends asked earlier, and I will not bore the House by giving the same answer. If it is the same question, it will get the same answer.

It is assumed that the Government's concessions on the Bill would ensure that students from lower-income backgrounds would not suffer adversely. Indeed, it is sometimes said that we can perhaps take a leaf out of the American experience and encourage students to work during their studies, because those who cite the American experience think that that is healthy. The Guardian has referred this week to unpublished research by Professor Clare Callender, who has indicated that those students who work for 16 hours a week in term time have an increased chance—of between 10 and 60 per cent.—of getting no better than a lower second-class degree or worse. Hon. Members on both sides of the House ought to reflect on that.

By all means, let us talk about the overall spending envelope towards which the Government propose top-up fees should contribute. The Red Book states that the Government

"will maintain per student spending levels in real terms over the 2004 Spending Review period."

Labour Members may not be aware of the fact that per-student spending levels are lower now than they were in 1997; that they are lower than they were before tuition fees were introduced in 1998, and that they have been lower every year of this Labour Government than they were any year of the preceding Conservative Government. So a commitment simply to maintain per-student spending levels is hardly an act of extraordinary political generosity.

3 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that when the Conservative Government left office in 1997, the Government spending plans for the following two years involved a 6 per cent. decrease in university funding, and the Labour Government had to find the money to make up that deficit, having adopted the Conservatives' spending plans?

Mr. Collins: The hon. Lady knows that a large number of vice-chancellors are on record as saying that they felt they were duped—their exact word—by the Government when tuition fees were introduced, because the money was subsequently clawed back by the Treasury through lower than expected levels of public finance. That is why many vice-chancellors are not satisfied that, having done that once before when introducing fees, the Government will not do it again when introducing top-up fees.

Let us consider what the pledge means. The 2004 spending review period expires in 2007, which is just one year after the Government propose that top-up fees should come in. At that point the income from top-up fees will be well below the maximum levels that are usually quoted, because there will be only one year's cohort within the system paying top-up fees, yet at that point the Government's commitment even to maintain the present very low levels of student spending in real terms expires. So there is a very real reason for universities to fear that what the Government are giving with one hand, they may take away with the other—indeed, they may take away more than they give.

Kali Mountford: Given his criticism of the alleged claw-back, how can the hon. Gentleman be sure that there will be finances into the future out of general taxation? Can he be sure that his own Government, should there ever be one, would be able to match spending as the present Government can?

Mr. Collins: As I said earlier, the hon. Lady will have to wait for our proposals. If she has the genuine interests of universities, taxpayers and students at heart, she will have a pleasant surprise when she sees those proposals unveiled. If she merely has her party's interests at heart, I am afraid it will be a very unpleasant surprise indeed. I look forward to seeing her expression when she sees our plans.

Mr. Collins: I give way to the Chairman of the Select Committee.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman is reluctant to tell us the plans of a future Conservative Government for funding for higher education, but having forensically examined some of the comments of vice-chancellors on our proposals, he has said nothing about what vice-chancellors with any memory at all say about the funding of British universities under Conservative Administrations of the '80s and '90s. Will he enlarge on that?

Mr. Collins: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to say, as I indicated earlier, that the majority of vice-chancellors support the Government's proposals. That is hardly surprising. What is surprising is that there is a significant body of vice-chancellors who do not, so the Government do not have unanimous support for their ideas from any section of the education community. Most other organisations and most other groups in education are unanimously opposed to the Government's proposals. With reference to funding under previous Governments, I am sure vice-chancellors would have liked to have more funding, but the record shows that funding per student under every year of the last Conservative Government was greater than it has been under any year of this Labour Government.

Mr. Collins: I shall give way one last time, as I am keen to make progress so that others can speak in this important debate.

Jonathan Shaw: The hon. Gentleman makes some interesting comparisons. He said that there was no unanimity in the education field about the proposals from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Can he recall a time when there was unanimity on any proposal to do with education put forward by a Conservative Government?

Mr. Collins: It is rare indeed that the Association of University Teachers, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education, the National Union of Students and a large bloc of vice-chancellors all strongly in agreement and, as it happens, strongly in agreement that the Government should not proceed with the Bill.

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Alan Johnson) rose—

Mr. Collins: I said I would not give way again, but of course I make an exception for the Minister.

Alan Johnson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He has a former higher education Minister sitting behind him. Will he confirm that all those forces—the NUS, NATFHE, the AUT and everyone he mentioned—came together in absolute coalition when a previous Tory Government moved from student grants to student loans?

Mr. Collins: The interesting point is that the Secretary of State is not proposing to reverse that, is he? So that argument goes both ways.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Collins: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), who I know will make a constructive contribution.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage) (Con): Part of the coalition that opposed us was the Labour party. I remember the speeches in the Standing Committee by the right hon. Gentleman who is now the Foreign Secretary, anticipating many of the speeches that have now been made from the Conservative side in the course of the current debate. With regard to Conservative alternatives, my hon. Friend is a great admirer of Baroness Thatcher, as am I. Does he remember TINA—there is no alternative? There is no alternative to fees.

Mr. Collins: As is well known, my hon. Friend does not agree with our position on that. He is perfectly honourable about that and has set out his reasons cogently. We must beg to disagree on that point. Those on the Conservative Front Bench intend to invite my hon. Friends to stand by the manifesto commitments we made at the last election. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage feels, for honourable reasons, that he cannot join us in that, but that will not deter the rest of us from continuing to advance what we believe to be the right course for the future of higher education.

Peter Bradley rose—

Mr. Collins: I will not give way again. I have given way an almost unprecedented number of times, and Labour Members who have been intervening at such great length will no doubt start complaining that they do not have a chance to make their own speeches, so I am keen to bring my remarks to a close.

However, there are a couple of important aspects that need to be touched on. The first is debt. Why did the Government decide after the 2001 election that they needed to look again at student financing? One of the major factors was the reports reaching them about worries among students about how they would cope with the level of debt that they had. The Government thought carefully about how they could best address the issue of student or graduate debt, and came up with the proposal that the best way of doing that was to triple the tuition fees that students should pay. That seems an extraordinary way of dealing with debt.

However they slice it, the Government's proposals will result in future graduates leaving with unprecedented levels of debt, which will undoubtedly—academic evidence is unequivocal about this—have the effect of deterring some students from going to some universities to study some subjects. We on the Conservative Benches believe that we should have a system of access to university that proceeds on the basis of ability to learn, not ability to pay. That is why we will vote as we will on these matters.

I shall say a word or two about amendment No. 128. Our view is that new clause 5, which strikes out both top-up fees and tuition fees, is a powerful and important change to the Bill. Amendment No. 128 would strike out the five clauses that collectively not only provide for top-up fees, but provide the teeth for OFFA, the university access regulator, which rightly is strongly disliked in the university sector.

The Secretary of State may have a document from Universities UK in which it indicates—reluctantly, I suspect—that it is prepared to live with OFFA, but that briefing note from Universities UK makes it explicitly clear that it believes that admissions policies should be the responsibility of individual institutions of higher education. That is not what the Government have been saying. The higher education Minister has consistently said in Committee and elsewhere that he believes that admissions should be a matter for individual institutions, and admissions policies should be a matter for OFFA. That is not what Universities UK seeks. That is why we invite Members to support amendment No. 128, not least on the grounds that it would defang a very unpleasant piece of social engineering and interventionism.

Peter Bradley: The hon. Gentleman has one last chance to give way.

Mr. Collins: The amendments and new clauses before us are, indeed, the last chance for the House to vote to uphold the promises all of us made at the last general election. They are the last chance for all of us to vote to give this and future generations of students the same opportunity of access based on the ability to learn, not the ability to pay, which many of us enjoyed when we were 18. They are the last chance for the House to vote for fairness for all classes and all students. We must say no to fees, yes to academic freedom, and yes to a better way forward for higher education than this dishonest and discredited Bill.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): I wish to speak to amendment No. 128 in my name and those of my hon. Friends, and on which I shall seek to divide the House. It was recommended by the Public Bill Office as the only way to remove the introduction of variable fees from the Bill, and that is the position that I take. We can talk about OFFA in more detail later. It would be a functional organisation and its work with the Higher Education Funding Council for England would be important. If the amendment were agreed to, that would not be eliminated as an arena for discussion where we could ensure that universities had the right access policies.

Variable fees are a really bad idea because—

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Gibson: I do not wish to take too many interventions because I wish to give others the chance to speak, but I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Campbell: Is it not the case that the amendment would remove any incentive whatever for universities to get their access plans through OFFA, because it will remove OFFA's teeth and make it completely ineffective?

Dr. Gibson: I have much more faith in the university system than my hon. Friend appears to have. The universities try hard and they have new projects, with science ambassadors, and so on, and we are encouraging that. More and more people will be coming in and are coming in because of such projects initiated by the Government.

My concerns are not new; they have been voiced many times during the Bill's anguished course, but they have not yet been satisfactorily dispelled. Variable fees will tie students' choice of degree and career to price. The choice of those with the greatest aversion to debt and those who are likely to feel its burden most—those from lower-income backgrounds—will be affected most. It was pointed out in Committee, whose debate on this matter I have read five times—it was an excellent debate and many of these issues were well and truly discussed—that higher education will be seen as a financial investment and a route to a highly paid job, rather than something to be done for love of learning, and that a variable fee makes the student concentrate more on the marketability of the course that they are about to study. I am sure that my hon. Friend recognises those words, which I wholeheartedly endorse.

It was also pointed out in Committee and by at least 15 vice-chancellors yesterday who wrote to The Guardian—I am aware that others have contradicted this—that variable fees will further widen the difference in income between universities. Those with a higher profile and a smaller proportion of students from lower-income backgrounds, namely the Russell group, will be able to charge higher fees and generate much more income while others will be forced to charge less. There will be no redistribution of income among institutions.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: Will my hon. Friend accept from someone who as president of the National Union of Students campaigned for him in the seat that he now represents, that it has been an historical anomaly that those people from the lowest socio-economic background have never achieved more than a maximum of 15 to 20 per cent. representation during the past 40 years in higher education, and that 51 per cent. of students studying in higher education institutions—postgraduate, overseas, mature and part-time students—are subject to variability, and none of the matters that he is addressing and which amendment No. 128 will remove, will address the fact that variability has not done what he claims for the 51 per cent. of people studying in higher education, and will not address the issue of getting better representation in higher education for the people whom he and I came into politics to represent?

Dr. Gibson: I thank my hon. Friend for her creative work in Norwich during that election. She may or may not think it was valuable looking down at me now, but she is absolutely right about this issue in other areas of higher education. I do not particularly endorse that, but I noticed in the Committee proceedings that some Members said that in those areas that my hon. Friend mentioned, there may not be as much variability as one might think. I see much effort being made to try to eliminate that in terms of part-time students, and others, to try to make it easier for them with bursaries, and so on.

3.15 pm

Peter Bradley: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Gibson: I really do want to allow others time to speak, but I shall give way one last time.

Peter Bradley: My hon. Friend made a point about the differential income of universities that he believes would arise from variable fees, and that was my concern before the Government agreed to take responsibility for the cost of the disbursements in grant that the university would have to make. Because of that adjustment, it now seems likely that some of the modern universities, which are teaching-led, will gain up to a 50 per cent. increase on their current income, whereas universities, such as Oxford and Cambridge, that are basically research-led, will have increases in the order of 10 per cent. or less. Therefore, the statistics show that the modern universities, which we all seek to support because they are doing most to widen access, are the ones that will benefit from the new income regime.

Dr. Gibson: That is a fair point, but if one looks at the whole picture, some universities are enriched, with all the extra money for research from their colleges, and so on, while others do not have such a privileged financial background.

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend chairs the Education and Skills Committee as I do, and we usually work well together, but what does he say to the general criticism that his amendment has been construed as a wrecking amendment, because he is a bad loser, having lost on Second Reading. [Interruption.] Is that a fair criticism?

Dr. Gibson: Those are really kind words. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Will hon. Members try to contain themselves when others are on their feet so that we can all hear what is being said? I am afraid that I could not hear most of that intervention.

Dr. Gibson: I shall treat that intervention with the disdain that I and many other hon. Members believe that it merits.

Part of the argument for variability has been that there are real differences between courses, which should be reflected in their fees. I do not know how we will quantify those differences. Do we match some arbitrary notion of quality to a figure, or do we measure courses against their potential financial pay-offs for the student? Do we judge it by reputation of the institution? How do we think that it will work? The market is unpredictable, and once we further extend the market principle into higher education, we do not know how things will turn out.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): Is it not already well documented by Universities UK research that young people from the lowest socio-economic groups invariably attend the modern universities and stay at home because that is the cheapest way that they can study? Is it therefore not clear that such students will always attempt to achieve the lowest cost to themselves and the lowest debt on leaving university? That is the iniquity of variable fees. The Russell group universities will charge much higher fees.

Dr. Gibson: I do not particularly subscribe to my hon. Friend's conclusions, but I admit that there is a problem there that needs addressing. I am sure that other Labour Members will be glad to take up that issue. I want to bash on to give others a real chance to speak.

The need to attract students to under-subscribed courses, say in the sciences—others may deal with that—may lead to such courses being offered at a lower price that neither reflects the cost of running the course or what a graduate might earn in the future. If lower fees are to be used as an incentive, can we reasonably argue that higher fees will not act as a disincentive? I welcome the aid packages that have been put in place to reduce the deterrence factor, but I am not convinced that they will be enough.

Mr. Robert Jackson: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I quite understand why the hon. Gentleman is addressing his own Benches, but some Opposition Members would like to hear what he has to say.

Dr. Gibson: I explained on Second Reading that I had to watch where I turned my back, and nothing has changed much since then.

I welcome those aid packages, but many students who do not qualify will be basing their decisions primarily on price. Even those who do qualify will still be looking for the so-called best deal—a phrase that has been used often.

One of the more seductive arguments for variability has been that while it allows universities to charge higher fees, it also allows them to charge less. I have already spoken about why universities might charge less. The argument concerns me because I can see it being used in the not-too-distant future in favour of raising the cap. Universities are already arguing that £3,000 is not enough to close the funding gap. I know that it is some way down the line and that there have been attempts to restrict that, but it is not ruled out for ever. Once that door is opened, it will happen. Those words are not mine, but those of esteemed vice-chancellors who have supported the Bill.

The same arguments will no doubt be rehearsed again, although the intensity of the debate will depend on which Government are in power. The cap will rise and divisions between rich and poor institutions and students will widen further. The money from the new legislation will only just have begun to reach the universities when the promised review of the system takes place. By then, it will be both too late and too soon to turn back, and we will, most likely, have no option but to continue down the same path, which we still have a choice about embarking on today. Can we honestly expect that the other funding models that we have not been able to debate openly will be considered if top-up fees do not appear to be working?

Amendment No. 128, which I and colleagues have tabled, has aroused lots of confusion and controversy. I firmly resent the allegation that I have been colluding with the Opposition in an attempt to derail my own Government. I regret that this issue has been turned into a matter of loyalty; it is a matter of principle that strikes at the very core of what Labour Members stand for. The amendment was tabled in good faith by those who wish to keep intact the positive aspects of the Bill, but prevent the introduction of variability as a matter of principle and for the reasons that I have outlined.

The effects of the amendment were checked with the Public Bill Office. If the amendment is passed, section 26 of the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998 will remain and prevent universities from raising fees. That will be the case unless the Government themselves repeal section 26. It will be open to the Government to introduce amendments in the Lords to change the level of the current fee should they so desire.

Alan Johnson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I accept, because he is an honourable man, his assurance that he has not colluded with the Conservative party and does not consider the amendment as seeking to wreck the Bill. Did he hear the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), the Opposition spokesman, say on the "Today" programme of the amendment:

> "I think it was quite rightly described yesterday morning . . . by the Higher Education Minister . . . as a wrecking amendment. It undermines the Government's whole policy."

He said that it takes away the powers that the regulator has to impose any kind of sanction on universities. Does he accept that that is the view of Her Majesty's official Opposition?

Dr. Gibson: I thank my right hon. Friend for that contribution. I am very glad that I am not associated with that particular view. I do not agree with that view at all, as that is not my reason for tabling the amendment.

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in Parliament, we are supposed to respond to proposals that come from the Government, and we often find ourselves voting with the Opposition on issues such as peace in Northern Ireland? It also happened on the war in Iraq. The suggestion that those of us who want to adhere to our manifesto commitment and ensure equity in access to higher education are playing games with the Opposition is a dishonourable attack.

Dr. Gibson: I thank my right hon. Friend for that intervention.

I am told that the restoration of student grants and the proposed repayment scheme that will be introduced by secondary legislation—again, this comes from the Public Bill Office—would not be affected by the amendment and should not be dependent on the introduction of variable fees. I am told that the office for fair access would still be able to monitor access. These are progressive measures that only our Government, a Labour Government, could put forward. The already rising amounts of student debt and increased hardship, as well as widening access, all need to be addressed. I feel that introducing variable fees is a heavy price to pay for the measures that counteracts any improvements that can be made.

I am told that the Bill would not have to be withdrawn if the amendment were passed. That would be a travesty because of the positive things that it contains. The issue of variability has been presented as non-negotiable from the start. If any issue needed and was crying out for negotiation, variable fees would be it.

Ultimately, a decision needs to be made on whether variable fees are essential for developing our universities into a truly national system based on excellence where innovation and scholarship flourish. On balance, I believe that the Government would be making less of a compromise if they were to support the amendment, scrap variable fees and prevent a divided and divisive university system.

Mr. Willis: It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson).

I wish to speak to a series of amendments. In particular, new clause 8 would remove all fees in exactly the same way as new clause 5, which the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) tabled. New clause 9 is consequential on new clause 8 and would remove fees in Wales. Amendments Nos. 53 to 58 and 71 to 86 are also consequential on new clause 8 and new clause 9. New clause 10 deals with age discrimination, and new clause 12 relates to public services.

One of the saddest sights in the past few weeks since the conclusion of the Committee stage has been the witch hunt that has been conducted against the hon. Member for Norwich, North because he happens to disagree with those on the Government Front Bench. For any member of the Government party to be called disloyal for supporting his own manifesto seems the most absurd piece of skullduggery from those on the Government Benches that one could imagine.

May I also say to the Secretary of State and the Minister that the disingenuous comments made on yesterday's "Today" programme, which have been repeated today, suggesting that amendment No. 128 would open the floodgates in allowing universities to charge fees in excess of £10,000, are absolute nonsense. In reality, two amendments have been tabled—[Interruption.] The Minister will have to contain himself. Amendments Nos. 10 and 12 would restore to the Bill those elements of the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998 that the Government wish to take out and replace. Nevertheless, the Minister and the Secretary of State should be honest enough—I believe that they are honest gentlemen—to say that there is no evidence to show that, before 1998, any university in the United Kingdom charged either tuition fees or differential fees. They did not do so, because measures in the Education (Schools) Act 1992 and the Education (Student Loans) Act 1990 prevented them from doing so. Of course, the Higher Education Funding Council for England and its predecessor bodies had powers allowing them not to give grant funding to universities that misused their charter. Those powers were put into the 1998 Act primarily as a result of Labour Back Benchers' concerns that there was nothing in the measure to limit the powers top-up fees or further fees. That was the reason for it. I suspect that HEFCE's powers will be exactly the same as those before 1998, and I expect the Minister to address that specific issue when he winds up the debate.

3.30 pm

New clause 10 addresses age discrimination, which was briefly addressed in Committee, and many organisations that work with older people such as Age Concern and the National Institute of Adult Continuing Education support it. The Government have recognised that, for a variety of reasons, people will work longer in the workplace than was assumed 10 or 15 years ago. When I was working in the late 1980s and early 1990s, we all assumed that we would have so much leisure time that we would scramble around and not know what to do with it. In reality, many people will certainly work until the age of 65 and beyond, and to deny them access to the same conditions as under-55s is fundamentally wrong.

In October 2000, the UK Government signed the EU directive on equal treatment for older people, and they are committed to implementing age legislation by 2006, but if the Bill is enacted in its current state, it will directly contradict that intention. The Government have moved on supporting students over 55 years of age, and I hope that they agree to examine that issue in their review of the funding arrangements. Although I will not ask for a separate vote on new clause 10, I trust that the Minister will address that issue in his winding-up speech.

New clause 12 is the right hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) new clause, and it is the direct response to what he claimed he had achieved when he decided not to support those who oppose top-up fees by voting for the Second Reading of the Bill. On Second Reading, he said:

> "My fear is for the next poorest, particularly those who wish to make a career in the professions and public service and are therefore likely to incur above-average expenses while studying"—[Official Report, 27 January 2004; Vol. 417, c. 191.]

In the round of broadcasts conducted by him, it was assumed that he had received a concession from the Secretary of State that there would be legislation, or certainly regulation, to allow those people going into the public sector to have preferential treatment on fees and the interest paid on those fees.

The issue is serious: however income-contingent repayment of debt is presented, we want many of the students who graduate from our universities—the Government anticipate that 75 per cent. of universities will charge the maximum top-up fee—to go into the public services. We want graduates to become policemen, social workers, teachers and health professionals, which is right and proper. As an employer, the Government are right to ask, "What should we put in place to support those people?"

If somebody who works in the public sector moves into the private sector, however, it is not the taxpayer's responsibility to support them by contributing to their fees and associated costs, which private sector employers should support. The Secretary of State was bold to state in the White Paper that he and his colleagues must get to grips with that issue. Whether the Home Office pays the costs of graduate policemen, whether other Departments pay or whether the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pays, is not an issue for this debate, but it must certainly be addressed.

Jonathan Shaw: Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that the Government support people who go into public service? For example, teachers engaged in postgraduate training receive £6,000. Indeed, support for the public services in the south-east has been enhanced, and there has been a further announcement on the keyworker initiative, which assists front-line public sector workers with the expensive cost of housing in the south-east—it is all money.

Mr. Willis: Before the hon. Gentleman gets excited, I have always conceded that the Government assist in many of those areas, but that is not the point of my argument. My point is that after the Bill is enacted, top-up fees will result in significant debt from 2006 onwards, which will be a whole new ball game. We should not cherry-pick the way in which we support people who take certain subjects—

Jonathan Shaw: Why not?

Mr. Willis: I will tell the hon. Gentleman why not. The housing costs for a teacher of religious education or music in London are exactly the same as those for somebody teaching mathematics. The idea of giving one of them a £6,000 golden hello—

Jonathan Shaw rose—

Mr. Willis: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman; I am answering his question, for goodness' sake. [Laughter]. I am sorry—I sometimes forget that I am not a head teacher any more. [HON. MEMBERS: "You will be."] No, they would not have me.

The new clause would ensure that once someone has become a key public sector professional such as a teacher or a nurse, where a degree is an entry requirement, the 9 per cent. of disposable income payable and the interest on any remaining debt is paid for by the state, and if that person leaves the profession after two years, as they are entitled to, they pick up the costs. I hope that hon. Members will see that as a simple and positive mechanism for supporting public sector workers. I intend to press new clause 12 to a vote.

I turn to new clause 8 and amendment No. 128. We support Conservative Front Benchers' basic principle on the removal of fees, as stated in new clause 5, as well as the removal of top-up fees. We certainly support the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Norwich, North, and we will vote with him on that.

In his speech, the hon. Member for Norwich, North mentioned the notion of generous grants. That was picked up by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who accused the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives of scaremongering. Let us at least understand the basis on which we are having this debate. At the moment, poorer students pay no fees at all. It was a Labour Government who in 1998 introduced up-front fees. Labour Members are now railing against them and saying what a wonderful job they are doing in removing them.

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman has made many points about fees and debt. Does he accept that the fees and costs combined will be repaid at a gentler rate, which equalises the situation between students and makes the whole situation much easier for them all?

Mr. Willis: With the greatest respect to the hon. Lady, I have never denied that. The reality is that the debt will be no smaller as a result of the new proposals; graduates will simply repay it for a lot longer. The hon. Lady fails to understand that. In fact, a person's debt gets bigger if over a number of years their income does not qualify them to pay the 9 per cent. of disposable income, because the interest is added every year after that.

I was responding to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North. At the moment, the poorest students pay no fees and get a maintenance loan of £4,000. They pay nothing up front, and when they have graduated they start to pay it back. I can see that the new system is more generous in terms of paying the money back over a longer period.

In future, poorer students who go to a top university will pay a fee of £3,000, which will be deferred because they get a loan to cover it. They will therefore not have to pay it up front and they will get another £3,500 in grant. At the end of their time at university, they will have not £4,000 of debt but £6,500 for every year. That is £19,500 of debt for the poorest students. I accept that they have had the money as disposable income during their time at university, but they will be worse off and have a bigger debt than current students. If Professor Callender is right and every study that the Government have carried out is right—

Mr. Willis: My goodness—I should like to make some progress.

If every single item of research is right, the Government will know that debt deters poorer students—the very students whom the hon. Member for Nottingham, North and I want to encourage to go to university.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: Given that the hon. Gentleman is making a great effort to be sincere, will he deal with a genuine point about Liberal Democrat representation on the streets of Rochdale about current provision? It bears no resemblance to his comments. Liberal Democrats in Rochdale claim that all students have to pay up-front fees. Will he disassociate himself from rank-and-file Liberal Democrats who misrepresent policy? Does he accept that students do not have to pay back the grant? His calculations are simply wrong.

Mr. Willis: The hon. Lady's first comment was unacceptable and I hope that she will withdraw it.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: What about Rochdale?

Mr. Willis: What happens on the streets of Rochdale, God only knows. I have never claimed that the £2,700 plus the £300 bursary has to be repaid. I do not believe that any hon. Member has ever heard me say that. However, students will have to repay the loan of £3,500 plus the tuition fee of £3,000. That makes £6,500 every year. So much for generous grants.

Amendment No. 122 tabled by the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett) hits the nail on the head. When we began the debate, the £3,000 in grant and bursary was roughly equal to the top-up fee of £3,000. However, that sort of balancing equation will not occur in the future. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but by 2010, top-up fees may increase to £5,000 or £10,000 but there is no commitment in the Bill to increase grants and bursaries commensurately. The hon. Member for Hemsworth said that he wants a 90 per cent. link. I would be happy with any sort of link to ensure that students get that support in future.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman is making a case for no fees, whereas my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett) presents a rational argument in his amendment. As my hon. Friend knows, because I have spoken to him, the only problem that we have with it is inscribing in legislation a percentage that we might want to change more beneficially. If we were to accept the amendment, we would always be stuck with 90 per cent. That is why we prefer to leave percentages out of primary legislation and put them in regulations.

Mr. Willis: I accept that there are difficulties, but will the Minister accept later an amendment to include in the measure an affirmative resolution to cover the £3,000 and any cap on the fee above inflation after 2010? It is right to establish mechanisms to ensure that students at the top universities, which charge the highest fees, get commensurate grants.

3.45 pm

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's speech, and I hope to speak later if I can catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. The point of my amendment is to probe the Government. By 2010, a higher rate of fees might well have let rip: the upper limit could be £10,000 or even £15,000. What would then happen to the £3,000 grant and bursary? There is no linkage in the Bill, or in anything that Ministers have said so far, to provide for working-class kids and kids from poorer homes to get the £10,000 to £15,000 that might be being charged by then. That is the point of my amendment, but, so far, the Government have given no indication that any such linkage would exist.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. If he does not get the opportunity to speak, at least he has put that point on record. I hope that my description of his amendment was accurate.

Those Labour Members who intend enthusiastically to support the Bill and oppose the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) and others must understand that the only way that poorer students will gain any advantage in 2006 will be if they take their £2,700 grant and go to the cheapest university offering the cheapest course. That is the only way in which they will be better off under the Government's proposals, unless they invest the whole £3,000 on the stock market and hope that they make some money.

Jonathan Shaw: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willis: No, I want to make some progress because I appreciate that a lot of people want to speak.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North rightly said that the Government's proposals would create a market in higher education. We have had many debates on this issue, and I conceded in Committee that there is currently a social market in higher education. Given that students from the lower socio-economic groups make up only 9 per cent. of those who go to Oxford and Cambridge, we should ask whether that is because the lower socio-economic groups are intellectually inferior, as has been suggested.

Jonathan Shaw: Will the hon. Gentleman welcome the £3,000 bursaries—[HON. MEMBERS: " £4,000."] They have gone up already. Will he welcome the £4,000 bursaries that Cambridge will make available to poorer students? That move has come in on the back of this Bill. The Bill is changing the whole atmosphere, and more and more universities are proposing similar schemes.

Mr. Willis: May I suggest that the hon. Gentleman spends a little time in the Library and consider the wealth that many of the Oxford colleges have at their disposal? He should consider the £4,000 bursaries in relation to that wealth. He might then like to consider the wealth of Wolverhampton university, 47 per cent. of whose intake is from the three lowest socio-economic groups, or of the universities in Hull. He would see a totally different picture there. If he is saying that every university in the land, even the least endowed ones, will give all students a £4,000 top-up to their grant, then heaven has arrived here in the House of Commons. The reality, however, as he knows, is that that is arrant nonsense.

Mr. Rendel: Does my hon. Friend recall that the vice-chancellor of Cambridge university recently came to this place and was asked what proportion of Cambridge students come from the lowest socio-economic groups now, and what proportion she expects to come from those groups under the new scheme? She said that the proportion from those groups on which Cambridge is budgeting in order to be able to give this £4,000 bursary is just 11 per cent., and that if the proportion exceeds that, it will not be able to afford any more bursaries.

Mr. Willis: My hon. Friend makes a most telling point. That is the reality. If a cash-rich university such as Cambridge cannot afford more than a 2 per cent. increase, what chance is there across the piece?

Mr. Robert Jackson: The hon. Gentleman has been comparing endowments. He should consider the matter more broadly, rather than just what happens in this country. If he compares the endowments of Oxford and Cambridge not just with Harvard, Stanford, Princeton or Yale but with American state universities, which have been building up endowments, he will find that they pale into significance, and yet those are the universities with which Oxford, Cambridge and a few other universities in this country must compete.

Mr. Willis: As ever, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Harvard and Yale, which are the two best-endowed universities in the world—not just in America—achieve through all their glorious endowments and bursaries 4.7 per cent. of students from the lower socio-economic groups in the United States. If that is the vision for the United Kingdom's higher education system, there is no point any of us being here, because it is a travesty in terms of ambition. I want the students whom I have taught for most of my life, who come from very poor backgrounds, to be able to get into the top universities, rather than choosing their course or university on the basis of how much they can afford.

Fees and top-up fees will create a financial market that will be ruinous to our higher education system. If the Secretary of State were proposing variability that was uncapped, his argument would have real integrity. Some people argue that those who spend £10,000, £20,000 or £30,000 educating their sons and daughters in the sixth form of a private school should not receive tuition for nothing when they go to university. That is not what the Government are proposing, however. They are proposing a cap on variability, which is a contradiction in terms. I said that on Second Reading, and I say it again, because that is the reality. By 2010, that cap, by the Government's admission, will starve universities of the cash that they need now—[Interruption.] Labour Members must not believe all the rhetoric that comes out of fairy house down at Millbank—[Interruption.] That was a Freudian slip.

In the first year of variable fees, the maximum additional income that universities will get—all our universities, given the Government's figures—is about £300 million—[Interruption.] That is so. In that first year, only one year of students will pay top-up fees. It will take three years before three cohorts are in and the universities get the maximum amount of money.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman's proposal would remove £800 million that the universities currently get from fees. He cannot argue that they will have to wait a few years for an extra £1 billion while proposing that they should immediately lose almost £1 billion in revenue, which they receive at the moment.

Mr. Willis: The Minister has been characteristically honest, but that is not what I am proposing at all. The Liberal Democrat position is clear: we want to raise the higher rate of tax to 50p in the pound. That would apply to incomes of more than £100,000 a year.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willis: I am trying to reply to the Minister. The hon. Gentleman should not get so excited.

According to the Treasury, what we propose would raise £4.7 billion. The £2 billion that we would spend would give universities £1.1 billion immediately, and would replace the fees now paid by students. The Conservative Front Benchers who tabled the new clause would not give universities a penny extra. They would do no more than decimate the number of university entrants, and they would use the additional resources elsewhere. Please let them not accuse the Liberal Democrats of not having a solution.

Mr. Willis: I want to finish my speech, as many other Members wish to speak.

We support the removal of fees and top-up fees, as an issue not of popular politics but of principle. We opposed the introduction of tuition fees in 1997 and 1998, and we stated in our 1997 manifesto that we opposed both top-up and tuition fees. I have here a copy of the Labour party manifesto, entitled "Ambitions for Britain". It states on page 19:

> "We will not introduce 'top up' fees and have legislated to prevent them."

What is in that document is nothing but a deception of the British public. Page 19, like the rest, needs to be ripped out and torn up.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: I shall speak to new clauses 6 and 7 and the consequential amendments Nos. 32 to 52. I shall also speak to amendments Nos. 129 and 130. I understand that the Government are prepared to accept amendment No.129, and I am happy to allow the Minister to speak to it. I am pleased and grateful that the Government have made such an important concession.

Let me explain what my new clauses are all about and why I cannot support amendment No.128. New clauses 6 and 7 and the consequential amendments would remove the provision for variable fees and replace it with a provision for a fixed fee. To that extent they are similar to amendments that I tabled in Committee that were defeated, although they were supported by the Liberal Democrats.

My new clauses and amendments would strengthen OFFA, the regulator. They would remove the basic fee altogether. In order to charge fees at all, universities would have to draw up credible plans to improve access, which would have to be passed by the regulator. Having negotiated that hurdle, they would be able to charge a fee; but it would be a fixed fee. I have not specified the level of the fee, but I would expect it to be set somewhere between £2,500 and £3,000. Once fixed, it could be raised only with inflation. I stress that my proposal would leave the Bill intact.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on her cohesive new clauses and amendments, which offer a constructive alternative to variable fees. Does she agree that the possible polarisation of universities, which variable fees could allow to develop, is an element that is not addressed in the Bill?

4 pm

Mrs. Campbell: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, about which I have great concern. I represent a city constituency with two universities: Cambridge university and Anglia polytechnic university. I am aware of the wide differences between those universities and I should certainly not want to see them become wider.

I want to emphasise that mine are not wrecking amendments, and if the Government wished to, they would be able to operate within the regime defined in the amendments. In proposing my new clauses and amendments, I believe that I am carrying out the wishes of the majority of my constituents. Although in the constituency survey that I conducted there was considerable support for the student support package in the Bill, many people, particularly students, said that they did not want a variable fee. It is true, of course, that some of those people did not want a fee at all. Most students, when asked, say that they would prefer not to pay fees and for all the funding to come from general taxation. However, that is not the view of the rest of my constituents, and I must also take their views on board. I believe that it is right for students to make a contribution towards the cost of their education, which is the only realistic way of getting the extra money that is so desperately needed into universities.

I do not like variable fees because I do not like the prospect of introducing a market into higher education.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend believe that there are lessons to be learned from the United States of America, whose marketisation of higher education began in 1979? In that year, four times more undergraduates from the top 25 per cent. by income of the population attended university than their less-well-off compatriots. After 25 years, that ratio has now grown to 10:1. Is that not the real risk of marketisation?

Mrs. Campbell: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, but I do not think that the Government's proposals are as damaging as the provisions in the US. Although marketisation might bring some damaging effects, I do not believe that the damage here will be as great as in the United States.

I am worried, however, that students might choose courses because they are cheap, rather than because they are really suited to those students' aptitudes and abilities. I am also concerned that some universities might decide to charge a lower fee because they cannot attract enough students with a high fee. They will not then have the cash to pay for good quality staff and equipment, and standards will begin to spiral downwards.

I am also concerned that the modern universities take by far the highest proportion of lower-income students, and that their ability to pay generous bursaries is compromised to some extent by sheer numbers.

Peter Bradley: Does my hon. Friend agree that she has just set out the case for why it is highly unlikely that a market will develop in higher education? That is precisely because no university, whether Cambridge, Oxford, Wolverhampton or Huddersfield, can afford to forgo the income that it would secure by charging variable fees—top-up fees or, as they now are, top-down fees, and fixed fees with discounts. Does she have any evidence that a market will develop in higher education?

Mrs. Campbell: That remains to be seen. If my new clauses and amendments are not successful this evening, and if the Bill goes through, there will be a review after a three-year period so that we can examine the situation that has developed. I have set out the fears, however, and my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) has just pointed out the damaging situation that there has been in the US. The worry is that the same situation, to a lesser extent, might develop here, although, as I have said, I do not think that the proposals will be as damaging here as the United States provisions have been.

Tony Wright: Will my hon. Friend consider the fact that the Bill offers a highly regulated market in higher education? The consequence of a highly regulated market model failing is a cutting-loose by those parts of the system that want to create an unregulated market. If that happened, we would get not the status quo, but an unregulated market.

Mrs. Campbell: That is the very thing that my amendment is trying to avoid. I hope that by replacing the variable fee with a higher fixed fee, it will give the universities extra money, which they so badly need, and would at the same time prevent marketisation from developing.

Paul Farrelly: I just want to probe whether my hon. Friend's amendment is a probing amendment or whether she intends to press it to a Division. If she does press it to a Division, and if the amendment is successful, have the Government already given any indication of what would happen to the Bill? Have they, for instance, indicated that they might withdraw the Bill if the amendment is passed?

Mrs. Campbell: I would like to press the amendment to a Division and I have said that already. I believe that the Government have made some indications to other people about what would happen in the event of the amendment being passed, but I am afraid I have not had any indication so far of what would occur. However, I stress that the amendment is not intended to be a wrecking amendment. It is a very carefully constructed amendment, which would leave the Bill intact.

It has already been mentioned that Cambridge university has proposed paying bursaries of £4,000 to students from lower-income backgrounds. That means, of course, that with the £2,700 that is available from the Government, lower-income students in my constituency would have £6,700 per annum available without any need to take out a loan. I believe that that is very generous. However, students who are fortunate enough to get a place at Cambridge are likely to do much better for financial support than those who go to one of the ex-polytechnics.

I should like briefly to discuss my amendment No. 129 and then give my support to amendment No. 130, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead). Amendment No. 129 is very important as it changes the powers of the Secretary of State into an obligation. Under both the current legislation and the proposed legislation, the Secretary of State has the power to prevent universities from charging more than the cap, but he does not have a duty to do so. This means that if the legislation passes tonight without the amendment, a Secretary of State who does not wish to enforce the legislation has no need to do so and the House could not compel him to do so. If for instance, Dr. Richard Sykes comes along in a few years' time and says, "I cannot manage with a fee of £3,000 so I am going to charge £5,000", we may have a Secretary of State at that stage who thinks that that is probably correct, but does not wish to go through the burdensome process of either secondary or primary legislation or even the affirmative resolution process. That Secretary of State could say, "I do have the power to stop you, but I am not going to exercise that power, so go ahead." There is nothing at that stage that Parliament could do because we have left it to the discretion of the Secretary of State.

Jonathan Shaw: My hon. Friend is making an excellent speech, as she did in Committee. But is it not the case now that universities can charge as much as they want? Obviously, they would not receive any money from HEFCE, so is there not a real danger that unless universities of the type that my hon. Friend is describing receive a steady income stream now and for the future, some universities might decide to go it alone and charge enormous fees, and the type of access to which we all aspire would simply go out of the window?

Mrs. Campbell: That is the situation that the amendment is intended to address. My amendment would make it very clear that the Secretary of State is obliged to prevent the university from charging the higher fee—not just having the power to do it, but an obligation to do it. I therefore consider this to be an extremely important amendment—without it, the debates that have raged on the cap and on variability and whether to charge fees at all simply fade into insignificance. It is an important amendment and I hope that hon. Members will support it this evening.

I also wish to support amendment No. 130, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test and others. It would mean that the cap could not be raised above inflation before 2010 without primary legislation, and beyond that point only by amendable resolution on the Floor of both Houses of Parliament. I tabled similar amendments—Nos. 123 and 124—but I have withdrawn them in favour of amendment No. 130. A new higher education Bill would not be the best way to raise the cap, but that would have been the effect of my amendments. I congratulate my hon. Friends on finding a way that makes the condition much stronger than the secondary legislation would have done, because the resolution would be amendable and would give rise to a debate on the Floor of the House. I strongly urge all hon. Members to support that amendment.

I shall now explain why I cannot support amendment No. 128. As it stands, the amendment would remove clauses 22 to 27, which impose the conditions under which fees can be levied. That would mean, for one thing, that amendment No. 129 would fall, because it relates to clause 22 and the powers and duties of the Secretary of State. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) believes that if we passed his amendment we would revert to the current legislation as defined in the 1998 Act. He suggests that the Government would have to introduce further amendments in the House of Lords to raise the fee to a more realistic level. However, given the current state of relations between the two Houses, I do not share his optimism that their Lordships would play ball.

There is a more important objection. Without any further amendments to remove the repeal measures of the 1998 Act, as defined in schedule 6, the effect of my hon. Friend's amendments would be to deregulate fees completely, because that schedule will repeal the parts of the Act that refer to the current fee regime. The Conservative spokesman pointed out that amendments have been tabled that would remove the repeal of the provisions in the 1998 Act, but they were not tabled by my hon. Friend. To my surprise, they were tabled by the hon. Members for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) and for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins). Are those amendments really intended to be consequential amendments to amendment No. 128? If so, how come they were tabled by the Conservatives and not by my hon. Friends? I have to ask what is going on there.

Clare Short: The purpose of the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), and supported by so many of us who wish to adhere to our manifesto commitment, is to take variability out of the Bill. We would like the Government to accept that principle. If some consequential amendments had to be made in the other place, they would be easily carried, given how the different parties line up there. We are talking about a principle, not the technicalities of amendments. Let us be straightforward with each other.

Mrs. Campbell: I accept what my right hon. Friend says, but those consequential amendments appear on the amendment paper tonight and they were tabled by the Conservatives. I accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North has not colluded with the Conservatives, but I find it extraordinary that the consequential amendments have been tabled by them.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: I know that my hon. Friend has many years of experience lobbying the other place on higher education—as have I—and we have discovered that it has its own mind on that subject and peers often buck the Whip. Therefore, any assurances or blandishments that suggest that the Opposition might co-operate should be viewed with scepticism.

Mrs. Campbell: Given the present mood of the upper House, I find it inconceivable that any measure that was not passed successfully by this House could be moved successfully there.

If any of my hon. Friends are tempted to support amendment No. 128, I hope that they realise that to complete the ends that they are supposedly trying to achieve they will have to vote for amendments tabled in the name of Conservative Members. No Labour Member's name is put to those amendments—there are not even any Liberal Democrat or Plaid Cymru Members' names, only Conservative Members' names. I wonder what local constituency parties would think of that.

4.15 pm

Paul Farrelly: On the point of principle, does my hon. Friend accept that the effect of her amendments would be exactly the same as that of amendment No. 128, because they would remove variability from the Bill? If either were accepted, the effect would be the same—the Bill would be withdrawn.

Mrs. Campbell: I spent a great deal of time carefully constructing amendments that would leave the Bill intact. They would not only leave the Bill intact, but strengthen the role of OFFA, the regulator. I would have thought that many Labour Members would want to achieve that, rather than taking the teeth out of OFFA completely.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend received any indication from the Government of what their attitude to her amendments would be if they were accepted? Have they said that they would withdraw the Bill?

Mrs. Campbell: I answered that question earlier. The Government have not given any indication to me, but I understand that the Whips have been talking to people about the consequences of their support for my amendments, although I do not know what that might be.

A further problem for Labour Members is that the consequential amendments to amendment No. 128 would turn OFFA—the mechanism by which we will increase access for students from non-traditional backgrounds—into a toothless tiger. We would keep OFFA, but there would be no incentive for universities to increase access, so what would be the use of that?

Let us suppose that sufficient Labour Members vote for amendment No. 128 and then the Conservative amendments relating to schedule 6. What would happen next? I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has threatened to withdraw the Bill if that happens, and I take his threat seriously. However, he probably would have no need to do that. Given that he would have the powers but not the duty, all that he would have to do would be to make it known that he would not exercise his powers to require universities to charge a regulated fee. Universities could thus charge whatever the Secretary of State deemed acceptable—irrespective of what the House thinks. Hon. Members should also remember that OFFA would have no bite and remain totally immobilised, so universities could thus charge huge fees, have no effective access plans and take all their students from the well-off classes so that they would have no need to dispense bursaries. Is that really what my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North is trying to achieve?

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): My hon. Friend is outlining a doomsday scenario that she envisages if amendment No. 128 were passed, so it is only fair to ask whether she shares the touching faith that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) seems to have that certain universities would play ball and go ahead with an access programme, not least given that many in the Russell group take an alternative view.

Mrs. Campbell: I am heartened by the way in which universities have responded to even the mere mention of OFFA by introducing much better access and outreach plans than they have ever had. I know that that applies to my own university as well as many others. Removing the teeth of OFFA would not lead to an immediate withdrawal of such plans, but I believe that they would wither on the vine in time.

Mr. Barnes rose—

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP) rose—

Mrs. Campbell: I give way to the hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing).

Annabelle Ewing: Given what the hon. Lady said earlier this afternoon, if next year's Labour party manifesto contains a commitment or undertaking not to introduce primary legislation to lift the cap on top-ups, does she expect anyone to believe it?

Mrs. Campbell: I understand the Liberal Democrat position—[HON. MEMBERS: "She is not a Liberal Democrat."] I apologise; I meant the Scottish nationalist position. The hon. Lady has to accept that the situation is difficult. Universities are in severe financial straits. In those circumstances, it is necessary to look hard at what we can do to raise finance for them. As someone who has been in opposition, I can say with confidence that it is easy for Opposition parties to say anything and promise everything. She will never be put in the position of delivering on her promises.

Mr. Barnes: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Campbell: I am about to finish.

I cannot possibly support amendment No. 128 and I hope that my hon. Friends will not do so either. I hope that amendments Nos. 129 and 130 will receive support, and that if there is a chance to vote on new clause 6 that it, too, will be supported.

Mr. Robert Jackson: I want to explain briefly why I shall vote with the Government to secure the Bill's passage, which in contrast to the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), I want to succeed.

I do not want to rehearse the arguments, which have become familiar. Instead, I want to address a word or two of explanation to my party—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] I am sorry that so few of my hon. Friends are in the Chamber. My interpretation of their absence is that this is a case of bad conscience.

Both as a democrat and a Conservative Member of Parliament, I am delighted by the renewed will to win that we have seen in the Conservative party since the change of leadership. I salute the leadership of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard). Our two-party system requires both an effective Opposition and a serious alternative Government. However, I am concerned about the collateral damage that will arise from too bald-headed a pursuit of that will to win, which in itself is a good will to have. I am reminded of a remark by Stanley Baldwin about Lloyd George. He said that he was a dynamic force, and a dynamic force is a terrible thing. What I have is a choice between party interest and national interest. It is right, in such a situation, to take the national view.

Let me say a few words about the collateral damage that will arise if the amendments are carried and the Bill collapses. The effect on universities would be the postponement of the issue until after the next general election, which gives us two possible hypotheses. The first is that the Conservative party wins. In the process of trying to score points against the Government, it has got into a position from which it cannot escape making a manifesto commitment to oppose the principle of paying university fees. That would be the basis on which it would have to conduct its policy in government. There could be no question of a Conservative Government introducing fees in the next Parliament, and it is likely that it would not happen in the Parliament after that. So we would have at least 10 years in which university fees would not be possible.

We do not know anything about the alternative policy of the Conservative party. I do not think that there is a serious alternative, for reasons that I set out on Second Reading. What we do know about Conservative policy is what my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the shadow Chancellor, has said, which is that universities are not a priority. They fall outside the priority for schools and health, and training and universities will be cut. We definitely know that about Conservative policy. I have to ask myself: what will be left of our university system after a further 10 years of starvation during which a Conservative Government forbid what are in law private institutions from charging fees to their customers?

I turn to my second hypothesis, and that is that the Labour party wins the next general election. I think that we can exclude the hypothesis of a Liberal Democrat win. I assume that the Prime Minister will continue to lead the Labour party. I assume also that the present Secretary of State for Education and Skills will be an important contributor to the Labour party manifesto. I think that the Labour party would commit itself at the next election to introduce fees. Incidentally, I think that it was a great mistake not to have been more honest with the public during the last election. But there is a saying in the Bible about the "sinner that repenteth".

If the Government lose today, I think that there would be such a commitment in the Labour party's next manifesto. Listening to the debate within the Labour party, it is clear that there is broad consensus for that. People have heard the arguments and have taken them on board. I think that Labour would probably enact such a reform after the next election, but that would mean either a two or even a three-year delay, and our universities cannot wait for that long. Concessions would probably be involved, which would constrain the future of our universities even more than this Bill would do. I regret those constraints but I accept them as being politically necessary. It would probably also lead to an increase in the cost of concessions and subsidies to students, which I and the Select Committee consider unnecessary. For example, there is the interest rate subsidy, which the Select Committee has said is not justified. I do not think that it is justified even though it was introduced by a Conservative Government.

Clare Short: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us whether he supports the proposal for a cap on raising the top-up fee or whether he supports the Russell group's position of allowing prestige universities to charge what the market will bear?

Mr. Jackson: It is probably necessary that there should be a cap if the Bill is to get through Parliament. I think that in due course that cap should be raised. I believe that that experience will show that it will be possible to raise the cap without any of the adverse consequences that many Labour Members, and even Conservative Members, affect to fear.

My conclusion, based on the hypothesis that Labour wins the next election with a manifesto committing itself to this legislation, is that there would be a delay and there would probably be constraints and concessions that would make the deal for the universities rather less satisfactory than the deal that the Bill offers.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: The hon. Gentleman is even-handedly and fairly describing potential hypotheses. He rightly talks about the need of the universities for funding now. Has he heard Members on either side of the House at any stage advance a coherent and cohesive argument for an alternative form of funding that would ring-fence and guarantee the universities the money that they need over the next two to three years?

Mr. Jackson: This is a problem of any system of co-payment, but we must start facing it because co-payment is part of the future of our public services. Co-payment involves co-operation between the private and public sectors. It can be objected to any system of co-payment, that as private income rises, public income will be cut. But we must find a way of trusting one another to make such systems work. They work perfectly well in many countries throughout the world and there is no reason why they should not be able to work in Britain.

I turn to a second area of collateral damage. I am also concerned—some people may say it is a bit above my pay grade—about collateral damage to the interests of the Conservative party. If the amendment is carried, I think that it will be bad news for my party because it will mean that its behaviour will be noticed. If it is not carried, I rather hope that people will soon forget what we have been doing.

It is generally agreed that the battleground at the next election will relate to public services. Speaking with a certain detachment as someone who does not propose to stand again, I am struck by the enormous convergence of views in these matters that has emerged between the parties in this place. All or most are agreed on the need for reforms in our public services and the way in which they work. All or most are agreed that these reforms should involve decentralisation and that they should, above all, involve more choice and more tailoring of the service to individuals who use the service. There is also a general consensus about levels of taxation, and that we are reaching the limits of the tax burdens that we can put on people. Even the Liberal Democrats now accept that.

The Government's proposals for universities draw the logical conclusions from those facts and this convergence of views. What depresses me is that the Conservative party, which makes all the arguments for reform, decentralisation and tailoring services more to users' needs, flinches from drawing the appropriate conclusion. That will not go unnoticed by serious people.

4.30 pm

We are living in a post-ideological age. The ideological mountain ranges have collapsed. We have a flat political landscape. People are much interested in competence, leadership and consistency. There will be collateral damage to the Conservatives' reputation among many thinking people because of the line that we are taking on this matter, which a lot of people regard as simply disreputable. I salute the animal spirits and the revived will to win in my party. I like to see the Conservative party with its head down and its dander up, rushing at the goal. The trouble is that today it is rushing at its own goal.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): It is a life of ups and downs as a so-called Labour Back-Bench rebel trying to stick to the manifesto. It is important not to become paranoid. When I saw the headline in The Guardian this morning—"the Government cracks down on persistent offenders; surveillance will be used"—I was momentarily alarmed and, in preparing my defence, was anxious to say that I have rebelled against the Government on only one other issue. I was then mightily relieved to see that the Home Secretary was planning to crack down on violent criminals, rather than Labour rebels.

There are carrots as well as sticks, and the night before the House previously voted on the Bill, I was invited to dinner by three Cabinet Ministers. That has not happened before. Seriously, I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the way that he has conducted this whole debate. I have tried to attend as many of his seminars as possible. I now appreciate a little better how Maoist re-education worked all those years ago, but I thank him for his courtesy throughout this process.

I want to talk briefly about a deal about which the House may be interested. We have heard a lot about deals, but only one deal matters in this process: the deal that we all solemnly made with the electorate at the last election. All three major parties said in their manifestos that they were against variable top-up fees. We said that for very good reasons.

Alan Johnson: As I understand the logic of my hon. Friend's argument, a fixed fee set at a level that we choose—let us say £3,000—would not break the manifesto commitment. Indeed, we would be welcomed with open arms on the streets. However, if we say that less than £3,000 can be charged, it is somehow a great betrayal. I am confused by that argument.

Mr. Grogan: I have never said that I support £3,000 fees. I am glad that my right hon. Friend is thinking about the circumstances if amendment No. 128 is passed, because I always suspected that there is a plan B. He is obviously putting his considerable intellectual powers into considering what will happen if that amendment or those tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) are passed. I am pleased that, under those circumstances, as a responsible Minister, he will not throw the toys out of the pram and that he will return with proposals on what the fee should be.

Why have we gone back on that pledge? Some interesting arguments have been advanced. On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to the rapid pace of economic change since the last election. We have heard an awful lot about the increased number of Korean students. None of those are fundamental reasons why we should change our mind on this very important issue.

We have heard a lot about concessions, but let us remember that some concessions have not been made. I well remember my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State saying on television—I think that it was on "Newsnight"—that he would bet his mortgage that fees would not rise above £3,000 for 10 years. We are now told that it is a marvellous concession that fees will not be raised beyond that level until 2009—three years after the system begins. We were told at one point that there would be a universal bursary scheme, which would apply to every university equally. That offer was made to Universities UK, apparently. Throughout this process, Universities UK has made the parliamentary Labour party look like a great democracy. Ivor Crewe and the leaders of Universities UK have suppressed dissent. They did not even put that offer to the rest of the universities.

The grants are welcome. Under the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) and amendment No. 128, the grants would remain. Let us not forget that the son or daughter of a postman and a nurse would get no grant or fee remission. Those are the very people whose choices would be distorted if the fee level were raised, as it inevitably would be. All the Russell group of universities are not talking about £3,000 or £4,000. The logic of the system is that fees would rise rapidly to £9,000 or £10,000 by 2009.

Peter Bradley: Does my hon. Friend not accept that the only way the cap can be lifted to any amount—£9,000, £10,000, £6,000 or £7,000—is if he and his colleagues in the House consent that it should be changed? Does he not have any confidence in himself and his colleagues to control the cap?

Mr. Grogan: I have seen how the debate has gone over the past three or four months. I assume that in 2009 we will have an intellectual debate and we will all be able to make up our own mind. There will be no talk of supping with the devil, colluding and so on. We all know what sort of atmosphere the debate would take place in. We have only to listen to the Russell group and Professor Nicholas Barr.

I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House. I end by appealing to my colleagues. We are discussing a matter of principle. If the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge is called, I urge support for it. However, it is unlikely to be put to the vote because of the absence of parliamentary support, so we shall be down to amendment No. 128. It is spurious to argue that because the consequential amendments were signed by a particular person, we should not vote for the main amendment. Either we are colluding or we are not. On a matter of principle, I urge all hon. Members who have spoken so long and so loud from the Labour Benches against top-up fees to take courage and vote with their convictions. Vote for amendment No. 128 if it is put to the House tonight by the Speaker.

Mr. Clappison: I shall speak to the amendments tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends and on student support in general, particularly the way in which the variable fee structure is being introduced by the Government and the effect that it will have on many families.

I am concerned about the impact on middle and lower-middle income families and those with modest levels of income. Students from those families will be adversely affected by the proposals. I want to take a little time—not too long—to consider the detail of what the Government propose to do to families on a wide range of incomes. In the previous debate, we spent some time discussing how to encourage students from non-traditional backgrounds into higher education. I do not believe that background should determine whether someone goes into higher education; that should depend upon academic ability.

The last thing that I want is for someone from what is described as a non-traditional background with the appropriate level of ability to be deterred from going into higher education by the disincentive of the prospect of a mountain of debt for years to come. Labour Members will have to recognise that many students from non-traditional backgrounds are precisely those students from the levels of income that will be adversely affected by the proposals and find themselves faced with just that dilemma.

For all Labour's intentions with regard to OFFA, and all OFFA's supposed good works and encouragement—much, if not all, of which is already done by the universities themselves—students will be faced with, on the one hand, what they are told by the universities, OFFA and whoever else, and on the other with the prospect of substantial levels of debt for years to come, which they will have to repay over their working lives and during their most productive period of life when they have so many other responsibilities—buying a home, starting a family and so on. I want to speak out on behalf of those students and families today because their voice should be heard. I fail to see just what imposing those debts on those families will do to encourage students into university.

Yes, it is right that under the Government's proposals there will be help for families on lower incomes. There is help now. But to benefit from the help that the Government are offering in future, students must come from families with very modest incomes indeed. There is help for the poor, but it is fair and accurate to say that it is help for the very poorest. Those who come from families with incomes just a little above that level will lose out. I invite Labour Members to pay a little more attention—

Mr. David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: If the hon. Gentleman will just allow me to finish that point, I will happily give way.

I should like Labour Members to pay attention to the thresholds at which help is available for students under the Government's proposals, because it is a material factor in this debate that has not yet been sufficiently addressed. When hon. Members hear the Government talk of help and promises for the future, they must remember—to echo the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis)—that, today, students from families with joint incomes of £20,970 pay nothing at all. All of their fees are remitted. It is only above that level that they start to pay fees. To be fair to the Government, it must also be borne in mind that at present fees are paid up front, but in future they will be paid upon graduation, and I make that distinction. However, taking that into account, it is appropriate to look at the comparison between the help that is available now and the help that will be available in future, and the very much higher costs that students will have to pay as a result of the £3,000 fee.

The Government have talked a lot about the full higher education grant and getting that into the hands of students. It is right that that help will be there, but—I will give way to the Minister if he wishes to confirm this—the threshold for the full higher education grant is £15,970, substantially below the present level at which fees are remitted altogether. Between those two amounts there will be help, but it is on a sliding scale and it will diminish. That means that unless university bursaries fully compensate students, which they are not required to do under the Government's proposals, students from families with joint incomes of between £15,970 and £20,970 will pay for the cost of their education for the first time, unless university bursaries are given to help to bring them up to the full amount.

Even more serious than that, because help is now available below £20,970, in future, beyond a new threshold of £22,270, support for students under the Government's proposals falls off a cliff edge. The support goes down and down and the amount that students have to pay through the tuition fees remains the same. Therefore, a big gap opens up and students are faced with a real prospect of substantial debts way into the future. The Government give a small amount of help now for incomes above £22,270, but expect students to pay an awful lot more on graduation.

To take one example—it is apposite because it comes from the Government's own document on the grant system—under the present system, a student from a family with a joint income of £25,000—which might comprise a manual worker with a wife who works part-time, and they would soon reach that income level—will over three years pay £1,500 for that student's education. That is an up-front figure; it is the current total figure for three years. As soon as the new system of tuition fees is introduced, a student from a family with a £25,000 income will pay—this is the net figure, taking help into account—£6,300 on graduation, which is a more than fourfold increase. [Interruption.] It is on graduation, but in comparison with the current £1,500, a payment of £6,300 on graduation is not a very good deal. As the Liberal Democrat spokesman mentioned, anyone putting the money in the bank would have to find a pretty wonderful rate of interest to help them.

4.45 pm

Mrs. Fitzsimons: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper), as I indicated I would do.

Mr. Lepper: I thank the hon. Gentleman for remembering that I attempted to intervene on him. He suggested that very few people would benefit from the student support system that the Government are introducing. The figures that I have from the Library suggest that 40.86 per cent. of families with youngsters in my constituency will qualify for the full grant, while some 77.67 per cent. will qualify for a full or partial grant. Has he done similar research in respect of his constituency, and does he agree that the figures that I have quoted are by no means negligible?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Gentleman needs to look at the help that is now available—I hope that I have made this point sufficiently well; I may not have made it clearly enough—as compared with the debts that will be incurred later. The figures that I have given are net figures. I know that a £25,000 joint income in the south of England in a commuter-belt constituency just outside London is modest indeed. Families at that income level are struggling to house themselves and pay for the cost of living. Students from such families are far from coming from well-off backgrounds.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman says that he would like more generous repayment terms than the Government are offering in the Bill. May I remind him that the last Conservative manifesto said:

"With us, graduates will not have to pay anything unless and until their income tops £20,000 per year"?

Is that still Conservative party policy? If so, how will it be financed, given the party's commitment to reduce expenditure on higher education?

Mr. Clappison: As I said, the present position is that families on just above £20,000 do not pay anything at all. With all respect to the hon. Gentleman, I do not think that going back over previous manifestos is the strongest suit for the Labour party today.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I think that, perhaps slightly unintentionally, the hon. Gentleman misled the House in his claims about what students get at the moment over the course of their student careers. They are remitted £1,125 a year, but under the new arrangements they will receive a maximum of £3,000 up front a year. He rightly said that that still requires the payment of some debt, but has he taken into account the fact that that debt will deteriorate in relative value over a period, whereas the up-front money is valued at current rates? I am sure that he has taken that into account in his calculations, as it makes a 40 per cent. difference in his figures.

Mr. Clappison: My calculations were based on a written answer given to me by the Minister, who told me that, under the present arrangements, there is a fee remission of £656 from the student each year. Aggregating the balance produces a figure of £1,500 over three years. The other figure that I used came from the Government's own document seeking to illustrate the position under its proposals. It said that for a family with a joint income of £25,000, there would be a grant for fees in future of £900. Over three years, that amounts to £2,700, but the cost of the education is £3,000 each year, which amounts to £9,000, so on the Government's own figures provided in written answers, the final total is £6,300. The fee system is there for everybody to see, and it costs more than four times as much as the current system. It is a fair point that that sum will be repaid in the future rather than its being an upfront fee, but I have taken account of that. Any Labour Member who tries to persuade a student that paying £6,300 in three years' time is better than paying £1,500 now has a promising future career on daytime television selling debt consolidation.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree that the total debt that must eventually be repaid will be inflation-linked? Labour Members may argue that that represents a discount against the commercial rate of interest and is therefore attractive on those grounds, but the real resource cost to the Exchequer of supporting students in the future will rise even more—they cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Clappison: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Although it has been said that the weekly repayments will be modest, the sum itself is substantial. If the repayments are modest, the debt will extend over years and years, which is a point that students will take into account.

Labour Members must face up to the point made by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough that students who go into important lower-paid public service jobs will spend much longer repaying their debts than those who go into higher-paid employment, which will disincentivise students from taking on socially useful jobs such as teaching on graduation. That depends on students graduating, because facing such debt in future will be a substantial disincentive to students from such families to go to university.

Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: No, I will not. The hon. Gentleman has only come into the Chamber recently, and if he had been here a little bit longer he would know that I have been generous in giving way.

The amount of help given by universities is an important point that has been referred to and must be taken into account, and I tabled a written question about it to which the Minister responded. Bursaries will be available to students, and some universities will award bursaries to students from families with an income level greater than that required by the Government, which is £15,970. Universities are not required to pay bursaries to students from families with incomes above that level—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—but some universities say that they will do so, which is all well and good.

Relative to other UK institutions—I say that for the benefit of my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson)—Cambridge university has put forward the most generous scheme, which accords with the fact that it is an extremely wealthy institution. Looking across the list of other institutions—again, the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—no university other than Cambridge has made a clear commitment to give bursary help to students from families with incomes above the £22,000 threshold. I have not seen any specific commitments in the literature that I have received from the Minister, but even if there were a specific commitment to provide some help, it would have to be substantial help indeed to make up for the huge extra debts.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on the threshold limit. All universities must give at least a £300 bursary to students from families with incomes up to the threshold limit at which we set the £2,700 grant, which is £33,000 a year. Cambridge, Imperial, Exeter and Surrey universities say that they will give bursaries up to that level, and not the £22,000 level that he quoted. I believe, although I am not certain, that Exeter and Imperial universities have gone beyond that, and Surrey is the latest university to announce that it will go down the same route.

Mr. Clappison: I am sure that the Minister is right, but his written answer in February stated that Government proposals do not require a bursary to be given to students from families with incomes of more than £15,970. It is not clear from my correspondence with the Minister or from what has been set out by Universities UK that there will be automatic help for students up to those levels. I will not read out the letters, but no university other than Cambridge has spoken about the threshold going above £22,000. The Minister is nodding. I accept that he has made it clear that help will be available up to the amount of £15,970—in some cases £4,000, or at least the £300 that is required by the Bill.

However, that is not my complaint. My complaint is on behalf of families on lower and middle incomes of between £22,000 and £33,000. In my constituency, or anywhere in the country, £22,000 is a modest joint family income on which people may struggle. Students from those families will be daunted by the prospect of a debt of this order of magnitude—thousands of pounds stretching into the future. In response to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mrs. Fitzsimons), if we gave students—certainly, students in my constituency—a choice between the new system and the old system, they would not queue up to take the new one. It will cost students an awful lot of money, and it will be a particularly hard blow for middle-income families.

The Government have got it wrong. The introduction of variable fees is oppressive to such families and I am afraid that it will act as disincentive. I do not like discrimination, but I do not like disincentives either. I hope that Labour Members will exercise their consciences over that question. I hope that they will also consider the loss to the country that will result if those students respond to the blandishments that they are receiving from German and American universities to go abroad, where they may receive more generous help or not have to pay any fees at all. The House should seriously consider the fact that this measure will be a substantial blow to a huge wedge of families on middle incomes.

Peter Bradley: Like many other, but not all, Members of this House, I had a privileged education, and I have been privileged ever since in the salaries that I have earned and the jobs that I have done. Having been one of the 6 per cent. of young people who had the opportunity—although many more had the ability—to go to university in the early 1970s, I want my privileges to be other people's rights. That is why I joined my party and why I welcome the Bill, or rather what it has become.

I make no pretence about variability. A free market in higher education would indeed entrench privilege—that is why I originally opposed the concept. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) is right. Under a free market model the elite universities would get richer at the expense of the poorer universities. If that were still the position, I might be attracted to amendment No. 128, but what is now on offer is a firmly regulated market, if it is a market at all. We are no longer talking about top-up fees, but about top-down fees. We are no longer talking about variability, but about a fixed fee with a discount. In my view, which I believe is shared by others, most, if not all universities, across most, if not all their courses, will charge £3,000. There will be no meaningful market in higher education. The variability, such as it is, is likely to be in hundreds of pounds, not thousands of pounds. It will be an issue for school leavers when they consider which university to attend, but in no way a decisive issue.

5 pm

The manifesto commitment must be taken seriously, but it was written before we went out on the doorstep at the last general election. Perhaps my hon. Friends will contradict me, but I cannot think of an issue that was raised more frequently, especially in middle-class areas in my constituency, than the resentment, especially of parents, of having to pay an up-front fee to send their children to university. The up-front contribution makes parents wonder whether they can afford to send their children to university. The Bill abolishes the up-front fee and we should celebrate that. It shows the way in which we have listened and responded to our constituents.

The language of the debate in the past year or so has been misleading, and we are all responsible for that. We should talk not about student debt but investment in the future. A mortgage is a debt; for many people, it is a lifetime debt. The rights and privileges that the previous Government extended to people under the right-to-buy policy gave them an opportunity to contract a debt, which many regretted when boom turned to bust. That problem will not confront graduates, who, if they lose their jobs in future or take a dip in salary, will no longer have to repay their tuition fee contribution. That is in stark contrast to the debt that the Conservative party invited hundreds of thousands of people to enter into. Those people came to regret it when they found themselves in mortgage arrears and their homes were repossessed.

Mr. Barnes: It is certainly a question of investing in the future, but another question is: who should do the investing? Should it be done by society as a whole or individual students?

Peter Bradley: My hon. Friend is right. Society as a whole should make the investment, and that is what we are doing. The taxpayer bears 75 per cent. of the cost of sending a student to university. However, we must choose whether we are content for 6, 10, 20 or 30 per cent. of the young people in our communities who are academically qualified to take up university places to do that. Are we content to cap ambition at 10 per cent. or at 20 per cent.? Should we have a quota, as the Conservatives suggest? Or should we want the best for most of our young people? We should not cap their ambition, because they have a right to university education if they are qualified for it, and our economy needs their skills.

Mr. Boswell: Before the hon. Gentleman abandons the point about mortgages, does he believe that mortgage providers will take an interest in whether the applicant holds a student loan, with its obligations to repay? If they take no interest, will they not be acting irresponsibly in offering money?

Peter Bradley: A leading mortgage association has already confirmed that it has no problem with the proposal. Mortgage providers will take an interest in the earning capacity of those who wish to have a mortgage, and a degree significantly advances that capacity. Data suggest that graduates who enter employment have an immediate advantage of £4,000 a year over those who do so without the benefit of a degree.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North suggested that variability would discriminate against the modern universities. I challenged him about that in an intervention. The Government have reintroduced maintenance grants, which is a huge step forward, not only for 33 per cent. of students but especially for those from low-income backgrounds. The Government are now taking responsibility for paying those grants and not obliging the universities to do that. That has lifted a difficult burden from the universities with the highest intakes of students from low-income backgrounds and allowed them to keep substantially more of their income from tuition fees than was originally intended. Thus the very universities that contribute most to the widening access agenda will keep most of that new income. The figures that I have seen suggest that, for example, Bournemouth will have a 50 per cent. uplift in its income from student fees, Middlesex will enjoy a 37 per cent. increase, and my nearest university, Wolverhampton, will benefit from a 20 per cent. increase. That is in contrast to the uplift for Cambridge, Oxford and the London School of Economics—which are not known for their contribution to the widening access agenda—which runs at less than 10 per cent.

Chris Grayling rose—

Peter Bradley: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, but I want to address a point made by the Liberal Democrat spokesperson about Cambridge being an asset-rich university. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) will have heard my right hon. Friend the Minister citing other examples, including Surrey, Exeter and Imperial college, not all of which are cash-rich institutions, and there will be more to follow. They are offering students paying top-up fees a further £4,000, on top of the £3,000 available from the Government. That will give those students an income over three years of £21,000, and a repayment to make on graduation—on an income-contingent basis—of £9,000. That is a pretty good deal. When students and school leavers understand what is on offer in the Bill, they come to very different conclusions from those suggested by the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison).

Chris Grayling: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, under the current system, a student from a less well-off background will end up with student loan debts of about £10,000? After the introduction of top-up fees, even taking grants into account, that same student will end up with debts of about £10,000. So, at the end of their university career, their financial position will be no different.

Peter Bradley: We could trade mathematics, but let me tell the hon. Gentleman why the reintroduction of maintenance grants makes such a huge difference. Although the idea of debts, mortgages—whatever we choose to call them—is an issue for everyone, our society is not half so debt averse as we might think from listening to this debate. Most of us have debts, whether through hire purchase agreements, bank overdrafts or credit cards. Debt is an issue, I grant the hon. Gentleman that, but one of the principal reasons why young people with academic qualifications from low-income and working-class backgrounds have not taken up places at university, even when they are available—which, under the Conservatives, they certainly would not be—is that they cannot afford the up-front student living costs. They have no savings, and their parents have no savings with which to sub them through university.

The return to the maintenance grant is therefore a measure of which all Labour Members should be proud. It is radical, progressive and empowering, and it will allow universities to welcome those students into higher education, provided that the places that we can pay for through the tuition fees are available. It will also enable people to whom the privilege of going to university has been denied for decades to take up the opportunity to enrich their lives, to enhance their earning capacity, and to underpin our economy for generations to come. That is why the return of the student grant is a crucial part of the Bill.

Mr. Rendel: I want to return to the point about whether the new universities or the more privileged ones will gain the most. The hon. Gentleman says that, as a proportion of their income, the new universities will gain more than the richer ones. That is simply because the richer ones currently have a much greater income. Some universities will, by the hon. Gentleman's own admission, charge less per student and therefore bring in less in fees per student. I would suggest that those will tend to be the poorer universities, and because they will bring in less per student, the gap will widen in terms of the amount of money per student that universities have to spend.

Peter Bradley: There is a fundamental misunderstanding on the Liberal Benches. [Interruption.] I was just inviting colleagues to imagine what, among many misunderstandings, that could be. On this particular issue, the reason why modern universities will benefit disproportionately from the steps that the Government have taken to relieve them of the responsibility to pay out in grants what they receive in income is that they are undergraduate teaching led, whereas other universities, principally those in the Russell group, if they are not research led, at least have a high proportion of their funding vested in research. Universities that specialise in educating precisely those young people to whom I have been referring should and will benefit, and will be rewarded by their contribution to widening access.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: My hon. Friend has rightly drawn attention to the mainstream universities, which are precisely those that are most likely to attract first-generation students. Does he agree that that is why the Campaign for Mainstream Universities has issued a note today saying that any vote that risks the withdrawal of this Bill will be a vote against widening participation and social inclusion?

Peter Bradley: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that important statement. He also gives me an opportunity to use a line that I would have used on the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman if he had allowed me to intervene. He talked about divisions of opinion among vice-chancellors. Of course, he is right: there is no unanimity among vice-chancellors on this issue. Vice-chancellors are unanimous, however, in their contempt for the Conservative party's policy on higher education when it has one, and in their contempt for its opportunism when it has not. That is the unanimity that the Conservative party has managed to engender in the higher education community.

The benefits that I have outlined are those of a Bill that is radically different from the White Paper, which was rightly and roundly criticised until more or less the new year. I want to pay tribute to Ministers and give them credit for the fact that they have not only listened but responded to constructive criticism from colleagues. They recognised the argument that the real disincentive to working-class school leavers is not debt but upfront fees and living costs. The support package of £3,000 is therefore extremely welcome. Colleagues argued about the adverse impacts of modern universities bearing those costs, and the Government are now bearing the cost of those grants. We argued for the conversion of fee remission to grant, and we had an undertaking from Ministers. That was a brave step, as it meant changing a publicly held position. It was the right decision and I am grateful for it, as future generations of undergraduates and their families will be. We argued that elite universities must broaden their student base, and it is OFFA's task to ensure that they do.

The Liberal Democrat spokesman contrasted the £4,000 bursaries that Cambridge and other universities will offer with the situation at Wolverhampton. He said that Wolverhampton university would not be able to afford the bursaries. He is probably right. But Wolverhampton's intake, depending on what statistic one reads, is either 47 per cent. or 75 per cent.—or somewhere between those two figures—lower-income students. It will not be required to pay those bursaries, and it will not need to do so. The need and pressure should be on the Russell group of universities, which year on year have signally failed to embrace the broadening access agenda—the latest figures show a reduction in working-class students with academic qualifications being allowed to study at those institutions.

Mr. Willis: Under the Bill, if Wolverhampton university, 47 per cent. of whose students are from the three lower socio-economic groups, charges the full £3,000 fee, those students will each be eligible for a £2,700 grant from the state, and the university will have to provide £300. Given that it will have to find grants for 47 per cent. of its intake, compared with Oxford, which will have to find grants only for the 9 per cent. of its students who are from those socio-economic groups, how on earth will that benefit Wolverhampton?

5.15 pm

Peter Bradley: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point about the Liberal Democrats' fitness for government. In an ideal world, Wolverhampton would not have to bear the cost of the £300. What the hon. Gentleman does not seem to appreciate is that it now has a very high ratio of income that it can keep, certainly compared with what was originally proposed, which will boost its funding—I gave him the figure of 20 per cent. That is why, despite its reservations about variability, Wolverhampton supports the Bill. It will be good for the university, good for its current intake of students, and good for students who are yet to go there. OFFA's task will be to ensure that universities that are not meeting the objectives perform better and achieve more, which is why I support amendment No. 129.

[Peter Bradley]

We have argued for a three-year review. As the Government have conceded, that is incredibly important. Three years after the new arrangements are introduced, we shall be far better placed to judge whether they have delivered the benefits that we expect them to deliver. If we decide that they have not, it will be up to us to do something about it. I cannot understand why some Members do not have enough confidence in themselves and their colleagues to change, or to endorse, policy if that is the right thing to do. This measure is no different from any other in that regard. Both sides of the House will be whipped, just as they are in the case of other Bills. It is an insult to say that—it would also be unlawful—we will fetter the discretion of a future Parliament because we do not have enough self-confidence to believe that we can either sustain or, if need be, change our own thinking. That is a specious and dangerous argument.

We will have a debate in both Houses, and for that reason I strongly support amendment No. 130. We must be able to take account of the three-year review and all the other information that comes our way. We need a motion that we can debate, amend and vote on.

The amendments that the Government have suggested they will accept, along with the huge gains made on Second Reading, have significantly strengthened the Bill. They have strengthened Parliament's control over the future of tuition fees, they have strengthened the Government's obligation to police those provisions in the "duty and power" amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), and they have strengthened the regulator's powers to enforce the widening of access not just to universities already subscribing and contributing to that principle, but to all universities, no matter how grand they think they are.

The Bill is not perfect. No one wants to pay the additional taxes proposed by the Liberal Democrats; no one wants to pay the additional charges that we propose. This, however, is not just the best package on the table, or the only package. It is a good package—a radical, progressive set of measures that will help to boost standards in our universities, underpin their competitiveness, and create opportunities for working-class school leavers who never had such opportunities before and, without this package, would not have them in the future. I am not just prepared to vote for the Bill; I shall be proud to do so.

Annabelle Ewing: On behalf of the Scottish Nationalists and Plaid Cymru, I rise to support amendment No. 128, which would delete what I believe to be iniquitous proposals to introduce variable top-up fees. In my view, they are wrong in principle. They will create a two-tier system, and will treat university education as if it were just another commodity in the marketplace. I think that my opinions reflect widespread concern among parents, students and university principals throughout Scotland. Those people have a great fear of the negative impact of the proposals on the university sector in Scotland. That issue was highlighted in the report of the Scottish Parliament's cross-party Enterprise and Culture Committee, which was produced in December 2003. The committee had spent three months taking evidence from all relevant parties and sectors, and the report's conclusion was that the top-up fee proposals in the Bill would have an adverse impact on Scottish higher education.

That conclusion has been echoed by the majority of university principals in Scotland, and has even been admitted, although very late in the day, by Scotland's Labour First Minister. The key issue is that because of the Barnett formula, if more private money is levered into the university sector south of the border, that will create in the longer term a chronic funding gap in Scotland because there will be no Barnett consequentials for the Scottish university sector. That is widely accepted in Scotland and is the view of the majority of university principals there, so I do not know quite why the Minister is shaking his head. Perhaps he has not been in communication with the university principals in Scotland.

The report's conclusion is that there will be a significant and detrimental impact on research in Scotland's universities, which at the moment have an excellent reputation, and deservedly so. There will also, of course, be a significant impact on recruitment. Those facts are incontrovertible. Notwithstanding that, on Second Reading, we saw 46 Scottish Labour MPs troop into the Lobby to support the Government and vote against Scotland's interests. We also saw the solo Scottish Tory MP sit on his hands, although he has managed to vote on some measures that have no impact whatever on Scotland, such as the Mersey Tunnels Bill. The key issue is what the Scottish MPs will do today.

We have heard much in the debate about international examples, and I asked the Prime Minister at about the time of Second Reading why on earth, if a country such as Ireland could use its powers to abolish all tuition fees, as it did in the 1990s, and secure a participation rate of more than 50 per cent., he could not secure such a result in England. In his answer, interestingly, he pointed to the example of New Zealand, but as we have heard today, that was perhaps not a good example to use in seeking to strengthen the Prime Minister's case.

I shall keep my intervention brief, because I appreciate that other Members want to contribute, but the key issue for Scotland today is whether the Scottish Labour MPs will put Scotland's interests and their constituents' interests ahead of the political interests of the UK Prime Minister. Is the solo Scottish Tory MP once again going to sit on his hands and abstain? Vital Scottish interests are at stake, and it is noteworthy that not one Scottish MP has even sought to listen to any part of today's debate, with the notable exception of the Father of the House. The House might not know that he is the only Scottish MP to be a university rector—he is the rector of Edinburgh university, and chairs its court. The Father of the House, well knowing the views of the university sector in Scotland, took the principled position on Second Reading of voting against the Bill.

Given that vital Scottish interests are at stake tonight, I hope that the Scottish MPs who voted with the Government last time will reflect a little further, and will put Scottish interests ahead of those of the Prime Minister. If they fail to do so, their betrayal will not be forgotten or forgiven in Scotland.

Jonathan Shaw: My hon. Friends have discussed matters of principle relating to manifesto commitments, and we need to reflect on that. We must reflect on the argument about top-up fees put forward at the time of the manifesto, which referred to fees on top of up-front fees. We are in a very different situation now, so I have no problem at all on that. My conscience is clear.

I am sorry to speak against my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), whom I like enormously. He is a fine fellow. He has had a glittering career both politically and academically and, perhaps more importantly, is a football star as well. We have spoken about the principles of widening access, of increasing numbers—that is, Labour and Liberal Democrat Members have, rather than the Conservatives, who do not believe in increasing numbers—and of providing more student support. It is vital that we bear those principles in mind and make choices for individuals, for the institutions and, very importantly, for our country.

We must make those choices for our country. Recent figures from the Institute of Employment Research show that of the 13.5 million jobs that are expected to be filled by 2012, 50 per cent.—6.8 million—will be in occupations likely to demand graduates. If we look across the world, India is churning out 1 million graduates, who at the moment are doing a lot of back-office work, but in future they will be doing development work as well, so yes they will have—

Mr. Patrick Hall: My hon. Friend is making an important point about the future estimated need for people with higher education skills. Does he not agree that those who deny the need for 50 per cent. of people to go to university are actually doing down the economy of this country, never mind those individuals who should go to university who have the ability?

Jonathan Shaw: My hon. Friend is right. So we are talking about the individual, the institution and the country. From the individual's perspective, it is not just a 50 per cent. target; as we have heard, it is a 50 per cent. projection. We are seeing more young people achieve and we know that if a young person gets two or more A-levels they go to university. Show me the queue of parents who will line up and say, "I do not want my young son or daughter to go to university." There will not be one. We all aspire for our sons, for our daughters, and for all the young people. We have continuously increased access in recent years, and that is what we need to continue to do for the individual and for our country. Jobs that require few qualifications will not exist in future. Foundation degrees will be a very important component of the increase to 50 per cent., providing the vital technical skills for our economy.

The issue about debt has naturally been central to our discussions in the Chamber, but we may not have discussed the fact that if a person takes on a debt to purchase a product, they want the product to be of quality. There has been a decrease in investment in our universities, and class sizes have risen. There have also been difficulties in the recruitment and retention of lecturers, whose pay is appalling. By increasing the revenue stream to universities, this measure will allow them to increase lecturers' pay to assist with recruitment and retention. That is vital because if you are graduating from university and want that qualification, you want the course to be a good quality product. We talk about the fear of debt. We know what we are talking about—

David Taylor: If a golden dawn is indeed emerging for those who work in higher education, why is it that Association of University Teachers branches throughout the country are so vigorously opposed to what is proposed in the Bill and the financial arrangements that surround it?

Jonathan Shaw: Perhaps when that dawn, as my hon. Friend describes it, does appear, they will not be so against them. Once people see increases in their salary they will not be quite so against them, but we must take those decisions now, or we stay where we are, or we find finance from somewhere else. If my hon. Friend believes in raising taxes that is fine, but I remind him that we have had issues about our manifesto commitment. We stood on a promise not to raise the top rate of tax, so where would the money come from? After all, we would be asking for a reasonable contribution—a graduate earning £18,000 a year would be asked to pay £5.19 a week. Most of my constituents would think that that was a reasonable starting point.

If we want to invest in our young people and widen access, this is the right proposal for the country, the individuals and the institutions, which need it for their lecturers. It will provide opportunities for so many young people in our constituencies. However, it is not only the proposals on student finance that will achieve that. It will also be achieved through the Sure Start programme, investment in primary schools, and investment and improvements in secondary schools. The Bill is right for the country, the institutions and the individuals, and I hope that the House will support it.

5.30 pm

Mr. Boswell: I shall speak in favour of new clause 5, because it would remove the possibility of charging for tuition fees, which would have an unacceptable impact on students and would be unstable in prospect—as I shall make clear later. My immediate concern is to welcome one aspect of the change in the Labour party. It has begun to take on board some of the principles of a market system. Nor does it wish to put up taxes—as has just been pointed out—at least not by the front door. However, that is not a debate for today.

I find it odd, however, that the Labour party dissociates itself completely from the impact of the price mechanism. The Bill will impose a charge for the tuition of students, and the fact of that charge—however moderated or explained away—will have an impact on students. If a charge is levied for something, it is less attractive as a result.

Mr. Robert Jackson: My hon. Friend, for whom I have great admiration, congratulates the Labour party on its conversion to market principles, but it is a little strange to do so at a time when the Conservative party is abandoning them.

Mr. Boswell: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments and I hope to have the chance to advert briefly to alternative means of finance, although of course this is not a Second Reading speech.

I make the point about price in relation to disadvantaged students and the discussions they have with their parents and siblings. Any imposition of fees is likely to act as a deterrent, at least for some of them. However much the charge is removed from the time of tuition and applied to graduate level, and however much it is attenuated or made more acceptable by maintenance grants—which the present Government abolished, of course—there will be a disincentive effect.

Before Ministers pat themselves too much on the back for their generosity, it should be remembered that some of that generosity will be financed by other students. The Government have improved the Bill, but parts of the package remain to be hammered out, with great difficulty and political angst. It will require the imposition of a charge on the universities that will have to be put back into bursaries, and they will in effect be financed by the less indigent students.

Mr. Barnes: New clause 5 would remove fees for students. Is the hon. Gentleman aware of my amendments, which have not so far been debated? They also try to tackle the student debt problem and are more radical in some respects, in that they would apply to all debt, and less radical in other respects, in that they would not get rid of all the fees in one fell swoop. They would provide for a holiday from debt. What are his feelings about those amendments?

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman has introduced his argument without having to make a speech to it. The short answer is that I am aware of his ingenious proposals. They deserve consideration, but I do not, on balance, come down in favour of them. However, at least they encourage discussion on the matter.

There will be problems for less privileged students, and I am equally concerned about the problems faced by people whose families are on a moderate income, which were set out eloquently and expertly by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison). There will be an impact on such people's families. Their parents may continue to make a contribution, but if they do not, it will add to the student's debt on graduation.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that, when graduates' salaries reach the point at which the repayment of student debt is triggered, they are likely to be taking on other commitments such as marriage, a family and a mortgage? The collective effect of the debts is likely to create a disincentive to enter a college course in the first place.

Mr. Boswell: I strongly endorse what my hon. Friend says. Her point was enshrined in an intervention that I made on the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) in which I pointed out that mortgage providers must take account of the overall package of debt.

Mr. Lepper: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of a statement made by the Council of Mortgage Lenders? It says that it "recognises that many graduates will still be paying off their student loans at the time they consider buying their first home. On the basis of the current repayment schedule for student loans, the existence of an outstanding student loan is unlikely to have any negative bearing on the graduate's ability to obtain a mortgage."

Mr. Boswell: I accept that the council does not wish to discourage people from applying for a mortgage, but whether lenders will be prepared to make well-founded offers on that basis is a different matter. The debt will be a debt that must be serviced by somebody.

Mr. Rendel: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when I asked the Prime Minister a question on that matter. I pointed out that one of my constituents who has a debt of a mere £12,000, which is much lower than the likely debts of the future, has been turned down for a mortgage simply on the ground of student debt.

Mr. Boswell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing that out.

I do not think that enough has been said about the Bill's implications for students on long courses, which I am worried about. Not all those people will go on to be in the private sector, and their burdens will be substantial.

Let us consider alternatives. It is a matter of record—I do not want to debate it with my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), for example—that when we were in government, we ran a system that did not charge fees, but that was open to fees. There was a slight disagreement with the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) about that, but the issue did not arise except on one brief occasion. At that time, we were still able to expand the higher education sector substantially. That approach would provide for significant access to higher education and I shall defend it on another occasion.

An alternative heroic approach, which is not ruled out by the Bill, would be to go for an all-private system—some universities occasionally talk about that. A university that was prepared to forgo all public funding could go private and rely exclusively on fees or other forms of private income. It could introduce needs-blind support if that could be financed. It is highly questionable, however, whether that would meet the access concerns of the Minister and Conservative Members and whether it could be introduced, because there would undoubtedly be consequences for the student body. However, I emphasise that that approach would not be ruled out by the Bill.

If universities find themselves in difficulties, despite the package, the Minister does not rule out the possibility of them moving towards unregulated parts of the sector—similar to the way in which public utilities buy businesses that are unregulated, if I may put it that way. I am thinking about part-time students—we had a constructive debate about that in Committee—postgraduates and overseas students. There is nothing to stop a university rebalancing its intake, which some have suggested they might do.

I was sorry not to be in the Chamber to hear the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage. Some important avenues could be explored in relation to the contribution that future employers and graduates can make to stimulate alumni contributions and endowments more generally.

One of my major concerns about stability is not simply the financial stability of the system and whether it will deliver. I am entitled to be at least slightly sceptical about Labour Members' claims. It is interesting that they inherited a system from us that was delivering a more than one-third participation without fees. They announced that it was necessary to make changes, so they introduced tuition fees and abolished maintenance grants. They came up with a system that was supposed to solve everything, yet six years later they are back to the drawing board with a repeat solution, as if the system was never viable in the first place.

Apart from the financing costs of the system, there will be a heavy regulatory price to pay. The fees regime will come unstuck because of the huge public expenditure cost, which exceeds the value of the fees available to universities. Equally, the regulatory system will not work and will pave the way for further interference in the admissions policies of universities.

My essential concern on the substance of the matter, as enshrined in new clause 5, is that the fees regime will break down and what has been put in by way of public expenditure to sugar the pill exceeds the amount that universities get. More to the point, the ratio will worsen over time as the level of student debt for most students increases and, ipso facto, the level of subsidised loan outstanding for each student, or for the generality of students, itself increases. Eventually, a future Chancellor will conclude that the promised loan subsidies will be unsustainable and the cost will be excessive. At that point, all bets are off.

Another pressure that may develop—the Minister will realise that this has been implicit in the debate—is that most universities will charge the market rate. As the Select Committee explained, if they do that there will not be a free market in any substantial sense of the term. A few fees will be discounted, but universities will be subject to a growing pressure to have a higher rate so that they have a greater level of differentiation.

Dr. Whitehead: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that amendment No. 130 would enable the House to decide, with a debate and by resolution, and with the possibility of amendment, how to deal with a ceiling on the fee charged after 2010? His concerns that the ceiling may well disappear and that we have much higher fees in the near future should be allayed, and I invite him to support that amendment.

Mr. Boswell: I was about to conclude my remarks, and the hon. Gentleman in a sense anticipates my argument. The Government's safeguards up to 2010 are a clause thick. If they were so minded, it would take only a very short Bill to remove the cap, and I think that the pressures to do that would be irresistible. It makes no sense within the Government's own terms to have a cap of such a nature because it neither contributes enough to universities to bail them out of their financial problems nor does it drive the agenda of social justice. It fails on both counts. It would take legislation only a clause or two thick to change things. I accept the Minister's good faith on the matter; he handled the Committee with panache and made an unacceptable brew a little more acceptable. Nevertheless, Ministers' assurances are about as convincing as they were last time we debated this.

The path will be clear irresistibly for future increases in top-up fees, which in a sense are beyond the immediate concern of present students but will form the next tranche of concerns that future students will have. That is the basis, in my view, on which the Bill is founded. If it has any supporters or friends, they are probably to be found among the 100 or so vice-chancellors, not all of whom agree but they are giving the Bill their support, fingers crossed, in the hope that it might do some good and that it will not break down while they happen to be in charge, any more than the Minister is, of this difficult and sensitive sector.

We need to examine higher education funding but we do not need to do so through the means of charging that the Government propose in the Bill.

5.45 pm

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I am grateful for the chance to speak for a few minutes in a five-hour debate on an England and Wales Bill on the Welsh aspects of the measure, which have not been discussed to date. So far we have had more discussion on higher education policy in New Zealand than we have had on that in Wales.

I intend to support the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who, appropriately for this debate is my former lecturer. I do so because I take the Government at their word. I have been told by many Government sources that if I support the amendment and it is agreed to, it will wreck the Bill. That is why I am supporting it.

Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends will not understand my point of view because there are many good things in the Bill. If they listen, I will tell them why I am doing what I am. If the Bill falls as a result of my vote, I hope that it will be a salutary lesson. The Government and Parliament have abrogated their responsibility to Wales during the passage of the Bill so far.

I oppose the idea of variable fees, in particular because of their effect upon Wales. This is an interesting test case for the limits of devolution. To what extent can we have policies that are different from the context of English policies? There will be different issues from policy to policy. On some issues, because of the effect of the market on a particular issue—this is one such issue—it is not possible to devolve effective powers, which would be implemented differently in Wales from how they would be implemented in England. I shall explain why.

We have an extremely integrated system. About half the students in Wales are English and about half of Welsh students are in English universities. That is because there is a market already, but the Bill will increase the level of marketisation. Students have a right to move from whichever constituency they are in and from whatever side of the border. I note already that, because I am speaking about Wales, there has been a loss of interest in the Chamber. If anything, variable fees will increase marketisation, but just as price differentials between universities will influence the choices of students as between universities, price differentials between England and Wales will influence the decisions that students take in England and in Wales.

Wales is extremely vulnerable to distortions that will come about through divergent policies. In the 2006 cohort of students, Welsh universities will be charging a £1,250 up-front tuition fee. English universities will be charging up to—the better ones will mostly be charging—£3,000. That will be a variation of £1,750 per student per year.

If we do the mathematics, the cost to the Welsh Assembly is £48 million a year in total to subsidise its institutions for not charging the variable fee, but they will not be able to charge it for three years, so the cost is £146 million. That money must come from the Welsh block, which is the money for schools and hospitals in Wales. The assumption is that there will be no market distortion, but there clearly will be a market distortion. If Cardiff university—a Russell group university—charges the £1,250 up-front fee, whereas Bristol university charges £3,000, there will be a £5,000 difference over three years. Naturally, Cardiff university will be more attractive to those who need to pay the full amount, so there will be a distortion and English students who have to pay the full amount will move to Wales.

Given the size of the market—690,000 students in England and 40,000 students in Wales—[Interruption.] No, sorry, I will make these points because they have not been made so far. I have to disappoint the Whips. There will be a distortion and people will move, but about half the students in Wales are already English. The number will rise, so the Welsh Assembly will be put into the perverse position of subsidising the education of the better-off English students—who would otherwise have to pay the full rates but prefer to go to Welsh universities to avoid doing so—from the money that would otherwise be spent on schools and hospitals in Wales.

What a perverse and ridiculous position to be in, and it could be worse because Welsh universities will not be able to pay the £2,700 bursary grant, which should go to the clever, poor students who can get into university. Poor Welsh students will be unable to find places in Welsh universities because they will suffer increased competition as more English students are tempted into Welsh universities. The Welsh students will have a big incentive to try to get into English universities because that is the only place where they will be paid the grant.

I put it to Parliament that that consideration is worthy of debate and discussion, and that the Ministers would have some comfort for me if they could explain how the Bill, which will devolve the power that causes that to happen, will work in Wales without resulting in the ridiculous position that I have tried to explain in my shortened speech.

Mr. Simon Thomas: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jones: I will give way once because the hon. Gentleman is another Welsh Member who has not spoken so far is this debate.

Mr. Thomas: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He is making a cogent argument. Although it is strange for me as a Welsh nationalist to say this, he is not quite correct to suggest that those arguments were not debated in Committee—they were debated. However, he is nevertheless right to make these arguments on the Floor of the House. I hope that the Minister listens carefully to what he is saying, but I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has factored something into his consideration that he has not yet mentioned. He refers to the market distortion, but there is surely a further distortion, given that the money that, in effect, will be added to the English university block grant will come directly from the fees raised in England. That will not be reflected in the Barnett formula, thus further distorting the situation.

Mr. Jones: That point was made by an SNP Member during the debate, so the hon. Gentleman did not need to make it a second time.

The Bill applies to England and Wales. Every piggyback Bill applying to England and Wales has had the same problem. Ministers and Members believe that it is not their responsibility to discuss Welsh issues. It is their responsibility because the issue is not devolved and Parliament must find a better way to debate such matters.

Alan Johnson: May I intimate at the outset that the Government are prepared to accept amendments Nos. 129 and 130, with the permission of my hon. Friends who have put their names to those amendments? I shall say a little more about that in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Barnes: My right hon. Friend mentioned the amendments that he will accept. Presumably, therefore, he does not accept the other amendments, including those that I tabled. It is important for me to know that, so that I can look for a procedural device whereby I can move one of the three sets of amendments in my name, which call for a student holiday from debt of 15, 10 or five years. I hoped that the Minister might be tempted by the five-year provision. I may now seek to move the amendment specifying 15 years and press it to a Division, but I will need to understand the procedural devices available to me.

Alan Johnson: I cannot help my hon. Friend with that, but as I said that the Government are prepared to accept amendments Nos. 129 and 130, he can assume that we are not willing to accept any of the other amendments. My hon. Friend argued his case on Second Reading. I doubt whether any party in government could accept it. It involves not just fees, but a loan, and calls for a holiday of five, 10 or 15 years before any money comes back to the Government. The problem with that is that it would cost us £100 million to £200 million—money that we could use elsewhere in a student support package. I do not have time to go into detail, but I assure my hon. Friend that we considered the idea carefully and we are not attracted to that amendment.

New clause 5 is an attempt by the official Opposition—this was not much mentioned when it was moved—to take us back to the period pre-Dearing and pre-1998 when colleges could charge, but when every student had a non-means-tested grant to meet the charge. It is a back-to-the-future proposal. I am amazed at what is going on with the official Opposition. I very much respect their Front-Bench spokesmen. Throughout this debate on the future of higher education, there has been only one Back Bencher on the official Opposition Benches. [Interruption.] Well, the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) is facing the right goal in this match.

No one has mentioned Dearing or the national committee of inquiry that the previous Government set up. The Opposition say that we should go back to the period pre-Dearing and that there should be no fees whatever. They support amendment No. 128, as well they might—it was originally their amendment No. 21—but they were not always in favour of the position pre-Dearing. When the Dearing report was published, the Conservative party supported its principles. The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who was then shadow Secretary of State for Education, said that the Conservative party supported all the principles laid out in the Dearing report.

Some time between that and the 2001 election, that turned into a pathetic statement that the answer to the funding problem in higher education was endowments. The hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) pointed out on Second Reading that £30 billion of endowment capital would be needed to raise the amount of money that we are providing for in the Bill.

So we move from support for Dearing, whose report the Opposition commissioned when they were in government, to a frankly pathetic policy of endowments to solve the problem, to this debate on the future of higher education. To be fair, the Liberal Democrats have a principled stance, although I do not agree with it. I accept that the Government's stance is mildly controversial, but at least it sets out how we intend to tackle higher education. But Her Majesty's official Opposition tell us that they are in a hiatus, with absolutely no policy whatever. That is poor form, to use words that Opposition Members sometimes use.

If that were not bad enough, we have the five principles that will guide Her Majesty's official Opposition when they do come up with a policy: to increase income for universities; to improve the financial position of students in respect of debt; to increase universities' freedom from central Government; not to increase taxes; and not to increase fees. It is no wonder that it is taking the Opposition a bit of time to come up with a policy when those are their guiding principles.

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) asked us to look across the waters at the system in New Zealand, and I am grateful to my university-educated hon. Friends who know that there are six universities in New Zealand. But since this form of university funding was introduced in New Zealand—albeit with a real rate of interest, which we are not introducing, on which it has had to backtrack—participation among those from lower socio-economic backgrounds rose from 18 to 26 per cent. in three years, and participation among Maori students, the poorest of New Zealand's citizens, rose by 46.1 per cent. in six years. There is a clear record that if this policy is introduced properly, with a balanced package, it will not damage widening participation. Indeed, I would argue, as many Labour Members have argued, that it will support widening participation.

Mr. Collins: The Minister will know that in New Zealand there was a 38 per cent. drop in the number of working-class males attending the most expensive courses. But on consistency, which the Minister seemed to be urging on Her Majesty's Opposition, if we unveil a policy that meets each of the five tests specified earlier, will he undertake to support it? Given that he refers to Dearing and to 1997 and 1998, why is one of the centrepieces of his argument in favour of this legislation the proposal to remove the up-front fees that his Government introduced in 1998?

Alan Johnson: I undertake, on the record, to present the hon. Gentleman with a Dan Dare badge if he comes up with such a policy. For ex-Eagle readers, there can be no greater accolade.

While we are considering new clause 5, which goes back to the position pre-1998, let us spend a second discussing the Dearing inquiry. It is easy in a debate such as this to say what the problems are and what is wrong with our proposals if there is no alternative. Dearing looked studiously at the problem. An NUS representative who served on the national committee of inquiry that looked at all the options said that we could not continue to under-fund our universities as we had done in the past and that we must close the funding gap and tackle widening participation. It was Dearing who pointed out that in 40 years of free higher education with generous maintenance grants, the social class gap widened rather than narrowed.

Paul Farrelly: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the capped variable system in Australia has not really improved access because it has had the common-sense result: higher fees have worked one way while improved grants and maintenance have worked the other? For our policy to be generally progressive, we must take access seriously, and all the access measures that my right hon. Friend has introduced must be at the heart of the legislation, not just an add-on.

Alan Johnson: I agree with my hon. Friend. I would argue that they are at the heart of the Bill, and I shall come to that in a moment.

Dearing said that there were no easy options. He looked at graduate tax and different ways of proceeding. New clauses 8 and 9, tabled by the Liberal Democrats, provide that there would be no fees anywhere in the UK apart from Scotland. That would be the result of those new clauses: there would be no fees apart from in the one place where the Liberal Democrats are in coalition government. They say—I love to listen to this, because it is a really good line—"Ah, but that contribution of £2,000 is actually for the grant"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but I remind him that he should be addressing the Chair. When he turns to address his side of the House, he is largely cut off from my hearing.

Alan Johnson: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Liberal Democrats argue that the contribution in Scotland goes towards a grant, not towards teaching. We are giving the grant free and putting the money towards teaching, but graduates still make a contribution. However, Dearing said that the real problem with underfunding in higher education is that relying on the taxpayer alone means that underfunding will always materialise. He said that, as well as the taxpayer putting in the lion's share—let us not forget that we are putting in an extra £3 billion of taxpayers' money, which is a 34 per cent. increase—universities need a substantial stream of funding that should be paid for by those at universities contributing once they have graduated. That is the essence of what Dearing recommended.

Mr. Willis: Does the Minister accept that, after the introduction of the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998, the Government removed grant funding pound for pound with what students paid in fees? In the United States, which has a similar system to the one that the Government propose, as soon as there is an economic downturn—the latest is in California—the state removes funding and increases fees to compensate.

Alan Johnson: That is wrong. We explained this issue in Committee. When we came into government, Dearing was told that, for the next two years, there would be a further 6.5 per cent. reduction in university funding thanks to the previous Government. Dearing recommended that it should be a 1 per cent. reduction and said that that was all that universities could take. Given that we had the same spending commitments as the previous Government, it was as a result of our using fees that we managed to meet the Dearing recommendation of a 1 per cent. reduction. Since then, in this spending review and the next one, there will be a considerable increase in funding per student.

The other point that I want to address relates to amendment No. 128. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) said that he believed—I accept that this is his belief—that what the amendment would ensure is in effect a fixed fee, deferred. What he means to ensure, and what he argued for, is that we should have no extra money for universities and that we should put in a huge amount from the taxpayer to defer just £1,000, rather than nought to £3,000, as we propose. There would not be a penny extra for universities and, in a sense, we would stay where we were and remain neutral in terms of the higher education funding gap.

It does not take a Philadelphia lawyer to look at what the amendment would do. It would do what the official Opposition originally intended—take away every aspect of control over fees, as set out in clauses 22 to 27. That would be fine if we were not also repealing under schedule 6 the current rules in the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998. Her Majesty's official Opposition have tabled two other amendments seeking to retain those provisions, but in the absence of those two amendments, the result of amendment No. 128 would be an unregulated higher education market with top-up fees in their true sense. That is the first crucial point.

The second crucial point is what the result would be if my hon. Friend's amendment were carried with the support of the Conservative party and we also put back the two provisions that we would otherwise repeal from the 1998 Act. The result would be that we could not have the £2,700 maintenance grant that Labour Members, primarily, have convinced us to introduce by rolling up fee remission with grant. Under the 1998 system, fee remission must always equal the fee, which leaves no money for a grant. It would be possible to increase the fee and the fee remission, but extra taxpayers' money would have to be put in—there is a lot of taxpayers' money in there already—otherwise there would be no single, non-repayable maintenance grant of £2,700.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): Whatever happens to the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), he intended to get rid of the principle of variability. I, too, am worried about variability, although I am heartened a little by the New Zealand experience. I worry that access for students from low-income families will be damaged and that students may not take long courses, such as medicine. If the independent review comes up with proposals to change the system to improve access and overcome problems with long courses, will the Minister guarantee that the Government will accept them?

Alan Johnson: We have set up an independent commission reporting directly to Parliament because we want to listen to its recommendations. My hon. Friend does not want me to come out with platitudes, and I cannot say what the Government will do in three years' time or that we will accept any recommendation made by an independent commission. However, I assure my hon. Friends that the commission will make its recommendations to Parliament, and any Government that ignored them would be foolish.

I shall go further: we are setting up an independent commission because we understand some of the concerns expressed by my hon. Friends the Members for Norwich, North, and for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) and other Labour Members about variable fees. If variable fees have a negative effect, the review will have happened early enough to change from variable fees to fixed fees.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): Will the Minister accept that it is morally wrong for students from identical backgrounds who have equal ability and who study the same subjects at different universities to pay widely varying fees? That cannot be right—it is not fair.

Alan Johnson: New clause 6 was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, and new clause 7 argues the principle of variability without the technical deficiencies of amendment No. 128. New clause 7 also contains a technical deficiency, however, because it does not outlaw anyone charging less than the fee, which would result in the introduction of variable fees.

Part-time students, who are mainly adults, pay unlimited variable fees, which are not deferred and there is no cap. The majority of part-time students come from working-class backgrounds, and they are looking to get into higher education having not been successful the first time round.

We say that if universities all want to charge £3,000, they can. It is up to them to set their fees between nought and £3,000, rather than the Government insisting that every course at every university must be priced at £3,000, even if universities say, "We cannot run that course because we cannot attract enough students." Universities could introduce variable fees through the back door by giving discounts, so what is wrong with our saying openly that it is down to universities to decide fees?

On the principle of fixed fees against variable fees, I presume that the Liberal Democrats will vote against new clause 6 if it comes to a vote. Their Treasury spokesman said in the Financial Times on 22 December, that Professor Giddens, to whom he was replying,

"is absolutely right in his criticism of flat-rate fees. This is the worst of all worlds: a poll tax on students totally unrelated to the quality of higher education provided or the preferences of students."

I presume that that is still the Liberal Democrat position.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): May I take my right hon. Friend back to his comments about the commission? On Second Reading, he gave an assurance that if the commission came up with a proposal to change the rate of variability after 2010, that would require primary legislation, but I do not see that in the Bill. Will he define what he would see to be such a change to the rate of variability?

Alan Johnson: I have only three minutes left. I have spoken to my hon. Friend about this before. I still say that if the commission recommended a change to the rate of variability, that would require primary legislation, and I am writing to him to tell him why I believe that to be the case. Other hon. Members have expressed agreement on the issue, but my hon. Friend and I have developed a misunderstanding. I am absolutely convinced that such a recommendation by the independent commission would require primary legislation post-2010, as well as pre-2010.

We are prepared to accept amendments Nos. 129 and 130 because we have listened throughout to the concerns that my hon. Friends have expressed about ensuring that the £3,000 cap has a proper grip. We gave an assurance that it would be changed in the course of the next Parliament, and we have added that to the Bill. We gave an assurance that any change thereafter must be subject to an affirmative resolution in both Houses, but we could not see how to guarantee that it would be taken on the Floor of the House. My hon. Friends provided that by tabling amendment No. 130, which proposes an amendable resolution. We are therefore prepared to accept it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge is absolutely right on amendment No. 129, which also touches on an important issue in relation to amendment No. 128. Even if that amendment's technical difficulties were resolved, the Bill would still give the Secretary of State a power, but not a duty, to insist that the fee cap is maintained. Amendment No. 129 rightly turns that power into a duty, which is why we are prepared to accept it.

We have had a long argument, and no one can say that we have not listened. We spent 11 hours in Committee on the issue of fixed fees versus variable fees. In three years, the independent commission will specifically consider that. We are introducing the grant, fee deferral, a much more benign system of repayment for students, and—for the first time—help on fee remission and a grant for part-time students. The extra £2 billion that we are providing to universities on top of the £3 billion that we are making available from the taxpayer will fund not only expansion and extra investment, but, at the centre of our proposals, the ability, through the regulator, genuinely to close the obscene social class gap in our higher education system. I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to support the Bill.

Mr. Collins: The Minister gave the game away when he said, "I cannot say what the Government will do in three years' time", because indeed he cannot. He is trying to persuade his Back Benchers that the commission that he promised them on Second Reading will make all the difference. He cannot promise to abide by its conclusions. He cannot promise a level of Government support at the end of the comprehensive spending review, although the Government will spend less per student in every year throughout that period than the last Conservative Government spent in any year. He cannot guarantee that the £3,000 cap on top-up fees will stay for long; indeed, most vice-chancellors expect it rapidly to become not £3,000 a year, but £6,000, £9,000 or even £15,000 a year. New clause 5 is the only mechanism, alongside amendment No. 128, whereby all the Members of this House who stood on the manifesto pledge,

"We will not introduce 'top-up' fees"

can keep their word of honour to the electorate.

It is no good any of us complaining of public cynicism about politicians if Labour Members vote cynically to break in the most outrageous way a clear manifesto pledge.

The Government's proposals do not have the support of students, university teachers or further and higher education lecturers. They do not even have the support of all vice-chancellors. They are bad proposals that rightly divide the House. They are in clear breach of open and honest pledges to the House of Commons and the electorate. We commend new clause 5 as the way to restore trust in public life.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Clause 22

POWER OF SECRETARY OF STATE TO IMPOSE CONDITION AS TO STUDENT FEES, ETC.

Amendment made: No. 129, in page 8, line 38, leave out from beginning to 'a' in line 40 and insert

'The Secretary of State must, when making any grant to a funding body under section 68 of the 1992 Act or section 7 of the 1994 Act, impose under subsection (1) of the section concerned'.—[Alan Johnson.]

Clause 24

REGULATIONS UNDER SECTION 23(6) RELATING TO BASIC OR HIGHER AMOUNT

Amendment made: No. 130, in page 11, leave out lines 19 to 21 and insert—

'(ii) each House of Parliament has at any time after 1st January 2010 passed a resolution that, with effect from a date specified in the resolution, the higher amount should be increased to an amount specified in the resolution, and the increase is an increase to the specified amount with effect from the specified date.'.—[Alan Johnson.]

Order for Third Reading Read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

7.9 pm

Mr. Charles Clarke: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is an important moment for the future of higher education in this country. I believe that the decisions that the House has taken in considering this important Bill secure the future of our universities and enable them to make the economic and social contributions that our society needs. They prepare the country for the future in a way that, to be fair, I believe hon. Members on both sides of the House want to see. As the Bill goes to the other place, we are producing a measure for its consideration that guarantees more resources for universities, that will open and strengthen access to universities and that will ensure that people from the poorest communities in the country get a fair crack in our society.

Many people deserve thanks, and I should like to take a moment to thank colleagues for what they have done. First, I thank the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education and our colleagues in the ministerial team, the Parliamentary Private Secretaries and in the Whips Office for what has been an outstanding performance. I know that no one will mind if I particularly thank my right hon. Friend for the tremendous leadership that he has shown throughout the consideration of the Bill.

Secondly, I thank my official team, the Bill team led by Lesley Longstone, and her colleagues who have given outstanding support, as I hope that colleagues on both sides of the House would agree, to all those hon. Members who have wanted to make points. Thirdly, I want to thank political colleagues on both sides of the House. There have been substantial and difficult debates, with real tension, as everyone has been aware, but throughout people of different opinions have been ready to engage in serious dialogue in a way that I appreciate and that shows the strength of the House as a place where political consideration can properly take place. It would be invidious to name individuals, but I repeat that a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House have been ready to engage in serious dialogue about the important issues that we have discussed. I emphasise that the way in which they have done so is important for the reputation of the House and Parliament and for the future of our universities.

Finally, I thank you, Mr. Speaker, the Clerks and, indeed, those in the wider university sector for their engagement in the debate on the Bill, which I have the honour to present on Third Reading this evening.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that a good number of hon. Members will vote for the Bill with less than full enthusiasm, but they do so because he has responded to some of the deep concerns that people had by introducing a much larger student grant, by putting variability in a cage for a long time and by being willing to review the arrangements? As he will know, I am particularly interested in next year's review—the Langlands review. Will he briefly tell the House how he will deal with the Langlands review when it reports?

Mr. Clarke: I appreciate that intervention, as it provides a good opportunity to say that we have tried throughout to have a serious debate about the kind of concerns that my hon. Friend and other hon. Members have raised with seriousness. I asked Alan Langlands, the former chief executive of the NHS and vice-chancellor of Dundee university, to conduct a report that we have coded, "Gateway to the professions", as a means of ensuring that people from all backgrounds can get the professional education and training that they need, particularly those who are not from the very poorest families, but over a wider range. When the Bill receives Royal Assent, we will immediately ask him to commence his work, take evidence from people and report as rapidly as he can. That is an example of the kind of work that is very important.

Mr. Allen: In the context of Royal Assent, will the Secretary of State also ensure that the Department is ready and willing to move very quickly to inform all secondary head teachers and the youngsters at those schools about the advantages that a £3,000 a year grant will give to those who qualify for it—those on incomes of less than £16,000?

Mr. Clarke: I am happy to give that assurance. One of the sadnesses about the debate in the country is that many people have been worried about the Bill's implications, but not all of them understand in detail the precise meaning for them in their individual circumstances. When we are free to do so—that is, after Royal Assent—there will be a significant programme to explain in the most effective way, certainly to families and particularly to young people, precisely how the system will operate.

I am glad to give that assurance.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will not, I regret. Under the agreement that we have made with the Opposition about timing, I must finish in a moment.

Today's vote was not only for the future of higher education, but for the public sector reform agenda that is so critical for the country. To conclude on a partisan point, the official Opposition, as was brilliantly exposed by the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), were shown to have failed utterly to live up to the challenges of the time. We accept the challenge. I commend the Bill to the House for its Third Reading.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for allowing me this brief opportunity to take part in the Third Reading debate, although I utterly deplore the fact that the Government did not protect the time for the debate. It is ludicrous to allow only 12 minutes for the Third Reading of such a controversial measure. It is not hard to guess why they have done that. The Government lost the argument about the policy comprehensively on Second Reading. They lost it again comprehensively in Committee, and they lost it yet again comprehensively during the debate on the last group of amendments, when my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) demolished their case in a particularly effective analysis of the consequences of the Bill.

The Bill is bad for students, bad for universities, bad for the taxpayer and bad for democracy. It is bad for students because it imposes on them such a heavy burden of debt that some will find it hard to get a mortgage, others may have to delay starting a family, and all of them will find it costly to repay the loans that the Government have forced on them. The repayment process for those who do not achieve above-average salaries quickly may continue right through their 30s and until the age of 40.

Equally important—a point that was made in the previous debate—the prospect of the high loans that students will have to take out, which will be up to £30,000 for a student studying at a university in London, will deter many potential students from applying to university in the first place. Sadly, the evidence shows that it is students from the poorest backgrounds who are most likely to be debt-averse, so the effect of the Government's policy of introducing top-up fees will be to discourage the very group of students about whom they claim to be most concerned.

Mr. Allen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: No, I am sorry. I have only five minutes.

The Bill is bad for universities because it attacks their independence in a way that no Government in the whole of our history have ever attempted to do. The access regulator will dictate to universities whom they can admit and whom they should exclude. The regulator will do so not on the basis of academic achievement or the potential of applicants to benefit from university study, but in pursuit of goals that have nothing whatever to do with enhancing the status of any university, and which will actively harm universities that aspire to world class.

The Bill is bad for universities for a further reason. It does nothing to guarantee that their long-term funding needs will be met. Under the Labour Government, funding per student has been lower at all times than it was throughout the 18 years of Conservative government. Funding from the Department per student has fallen dramatically since 1997. Although Labour introduced tuition fees over five years ago, the Treasury clawed back all the extra income that universities might have hoped those fees would give them. Nothing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary of State has said in the past three months indicates that the same process of clawback will not be repeated.

The Bill is bad for taxpayers as well, because although initially it may give the universities some extra money—there is no certainty about that—the amount it gives them will be far outweighed by the extra bill that taxpayers have to pay.

Worst of all, the Bill is bad for democracy, because less than three years ago, Labour candidates campaigned for election on the basis of one of clearest and most unequivocal election promises that I can ever remember—that a Labour Government would not introduce top-up fees and had legislated to prevent them. The cynical and unprincipled way in which that promise is now being broken will further damage the faith of voters in politicians and in the whole political process, a faith that has already been sorely tested under the present Government. If Labour Ministers really wanted to undergo a change of heart about top-up fees, they should have included a pledge in their next election manifesto and campaigned honestly on that.

The Government might just have got their Bill through the House today, but they have a long way to go before they win the argument in the country. I and my Conservative colleagues are delighted to have this chance to show that when we give a pledge to a voters, our word can be relied on, and I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to join us in opposing Third Reading tonight.

7.20 pm

Mr. Willis: When Government Back Benchers go back to their constituencies, let them realise that tonight they have voted through a Thatcherite Bill. They have changed the face of higher education in the face of a

[Mr. Willis]

Conservative Opposition who have opposed them root and branch. I am deeply disappointed that we have reached a point where we will have a two-tier higher education system, based on ability—

It being six hours after the commencement of proceedings, MR. SPEAKER put forthwith the Question, pursuant to Order [this day].

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 1st April, the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any Lords Messages have been received or until any Committee to draw up Reasons which has been appointed at this sitting has reported or until he has reported the Royal Assent to any Act agreed upon by both Houses.—[Paul Clark.]

Hon. Members: Object.

PETITIONS

Mobile Phone Masts

7.34 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): This is the petition of Sandra Cole, Councillor Tony Hunter and 1,632 other residents of Royston, Hertfordshire in my constituency.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition of Sandra Evelyn Cole, James Richard Cole, Dennis Stephen Geraghty, Anthony Hunter and other residents of Royston, Hertfordshire

Declares that residents of Royston, Hertfordshire are dismayed by the decision of NTL to site a mobile phone mast in Stamford Avenue, Royston close to a school and people's homes. They seek greater controls over the siting of mobile phone and other masts and are concerned about the impact of these on the health and well being of local residents, particularly children, including those attending the school, and on the street scene.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons shall urge the Government to give more control over mobile phone masts and other such antennae to local communities through local planning procedures and local councillors, and particularly that councillors should be able to take account of the proximity of schools and the health fears of local residents.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Morning-after Pill

7.35 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North) (Lab): I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children against morning-after pills in schools. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), who will follow me, will present a similar petition. I think that I am the last Member of this House to have voted against the pernicious Abortion Act 1967. I therefore completely support SPUC's campaign against the morning-after pill.

The petition reads:

The petition of citizens of the United Kingdom

Declares that the supplying to school children of abortifacient birth control drugs and devices is ethically and socially unacceptable and that such supply without the knowledge or consent of parents consfitutes a serious assault on parental responsibility.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons do urge Her Majesty's Government to:

(1) repeal or revoke any legislation allowing the supply of abortifacient birth control drugs and devices to school children, in particular the Prescription Only Medicines (Human Use) Amendment Order 2000 (SI 2000/1917) and section 63 of the Health and Social Care Act 2001; and

(2) lay the aforementioned legislation again before the House of Commons, re-drafted so as to prohibit the supplying of abortifacient birth control drugs and devices to school children.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

7.37 pm

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Following the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), I, too, beg leave to present a substantial petition on behalf of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children against the morning-after pill in schools. I have been proud to work with that organisation during my 27 years in Parliament, and I fully support its campaign against the morning-after pill.

The petition reads:

The petition of citizens of the United Kingdom

Declares that the supplying to school children of abortifacient birth control drugs and devices is ethically and socially unacceptable and that such supply without the knowledge or consent of parents constitutes a serious assault on parental responsibility.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons do urge Her Majesty's Government to:

Wansfell College

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Paul Clark.]

7.38 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I am most grateful for the opportunity this evening to present the important subject of the proposed closure of Wansfell college, which is in my constituency and lies on the edge of Epping Forest. The way in which a society deals with education funding is a mark of its civilisation. Indeed, we have spent most of today debating that subject—what exciting debates and votes they were. I am grateful to the Under-Secretary for staying on after a long and arduous day of debating higher education. He and I served on the Standing Committee together for many hours. Although that business has not quite concluded, I am glad that he has time to devote to education business, that, although rather more local and particular, is nevertheless as important to all the people who are involved with Wansfell college as the large and nationally important measure that we debated earlier.

I begin by paying tribute to Marilyn Taylor, the principal of Wansfell college, who, for the past 11 years, has worked night and day and weekends, along with her dedicated staff, to build Wansfell college into a popular and successful institution. I also pay tribute to the governors and friends of the college who work in their free time, out of love and respect for the place, to keep the grounds, gardens and building so beautifully. They also raise money to ensure the maintenance of the fabric of the college to which they are dedicated. It is especially well maintained, not only for the benefit of the people who visit from time to time but as an important asset to the village of Theydon Bois in which it is situated.

It is sad that we have to face the imminent closure of such an excellent institution. The issue of the future of Wansfell is a classic case of the buck being passed from one authority or Government body to another, of responsibility being denied by all concerned, and of the merits of the case being lost in a pile of official paperwork and financial statistics. That is why it is so important to bring the matter directly to the Under-Secretary's attention on the Floor of the House.

Wansfell college provides residential adult and community education. I could spend some interesting moments explaining exactly what the college does, but I do not need to do so because that is well documented and I expect that the Under-Secretary is well aware of it. I draw hon. Members' attention to the publication by City and Guilds called "Time to Learn", which lists many courses and which are popular and taken up by a wide spectrum of people in colleges that are similar to, but not exactly like, Wansfell college.

City and Guilds would not produce such a booklet and Wansfell college would not feature in it if the courses were not popular, there was not a demand for them and a considerable benefit did not derive from them. I commend the booklet to hon. Members. I do not imagine that many people who serve here will have much time for extra learning, but I assure hon. Members that many hundreds of people do.

Wansfell college is extremely popular, as is shown by the enormous number of letters that I have received from people who live in my constituency and from far and wide. They protest most strongly against the proposed closure. Again, I could read excellent quotations from some letters, which are well argued by people who present their arguments well. Not one argument can be rebutted. There is an enormous range of reasons why Wansfell college should remain open, and why so many people have protested so strongly against its proposed closure.

Many other Members have received similar letters in support of the work of the college, and I suspect that the Minister knows that because he has replied to a large number of hon. Members who have passed their constituents' letters to him. I know, therefore, that he has been aware of this issue for some weeks. I fully expect him to try to answer my points simply by stating, as he did in his replies to other hon. Members, that Wansfell college is the responsibility of Essex county council and the Learning and Skills Council, and that it has nothing to do with the Government or with him. Thus he can try to pass the buck and to escape criticism, but that is simply not good enough. It is the Government who have made promises about lifelong learning, and they have a duty and a responsibility to keep their promises.The buck has been passed here, there and everywhere on this issue, and when it comes to the House of Commons and to the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education, the buck must stop here.

The director of skills and lifelong learning at the Learning and Skills Council has said:

"The Learning and Skills Council does not directly fund Wansfell College, which is owned and managed by Essex County Council. It is ECC's decision on how and where funding is spent."

In other words, "It's not us, guv. It's nothing to do with the Learning and Skills Council." Well, I challenge that. What is the point of having a Learning and Skills Council if it does not take positive action to provide learning and skills? By that, I mean learning and skills right across the board, not just the specific qualifications needed by certain people to undertake certain jobs. That is, of course, an important part of the LSC's work—indeed, it probably represents 90 per cent. of that work—but that does not mean that this other part of the council's work is irrelevant.

Passing the buck is not a reasonable response to such a serious matter as the loss of this unique facility. Wansfell college is unique and it deserves to be treated as such. It has been ignored by everyone concerned: the Government, the Learning and Skills Council and Essex county council. The fact that it is the only adult residential college of its kind in an enormous area of south-east England has been ignored. There is no alternative; there will be nowhere else for people to go if Wansfell college closes.

The Minister has tried, in his letters, to pass the buck to Essex county council. That is not surprising, as it is the usual ministerial response, but I want to tell him why this case is different. Passing the buck in that way is nothing more than a dereliction of duty. Essex county council is in a difficult position. It has a problem because its funding from the Government was severely cut last year and the year before that. The Minister might argue that it was not cut this year, but finance has to be looked at as an ongoing matter. The world does not stop and start at the beginning and end of each financial year. The Minister looks puzzled; perhaps I should put that in a different way. There is no point in looking at the funding statistics for one year and saying that they have gone up by a certain percentage if, in the previous two years, they went down by a much larger percentage. If we look at the overall position, the facts are undeniable: over a three or four-year period, the Government have drastically reduced their financial support for Essex county council. That has put the council in an extremely difficult position and forced it to consider ways of cutting its budget and maximising its resources, or of massively increasing council tax.

Essex county council has been a responsible local authority, and it is rightly trying to keep council tax down. Therefore, Essex has had to examine its policy on the provision of adult learning, among other matters, directly because of the Government's financial decisions. I could go over all the arguments about finance and funding for Essex county council, but I will not do so because I accept that that is not the Minister's responsibility, and I will not make unreasonable requests of him this evening. I do not expect him to answer for Essex county council—[Interruption.] I am glad that his Parliamentary Private Secretary agrees.

I want to use the time available to focus on the issues that the Minister can address. I am sure that if he is well briefed on this subject, he will have seen the decision from Essex county council, the reasons prepared for the executive and audit scrutiny committee, and the way in which the matter was looked at on 23 March and subsequently voted on. I will not rehearse the arguments on that.

However, in a letter to my right hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Sir Alan Haselhurst), dated 16 February this year, the chief executive of Essex county council rightly said:

"A target of £90 million"—

£90 million—

"to be raised through the sale of property over this and the following two years, has been set by elected Members. The money is to be used in funding service provision, to supplement the Capital Programme and to contain Council Tax increases . . . The county council is therefore reviewing its remit for residential Adult Learning to determine its value in meeting the learning needs of Essex residents".

He goes on to make two arguments in favour of closure, one of which is valid and one of which is not—that is the crux of the matter.

First, the chief executive argues that Wansfell college has had a deficit over the past three years. That is technically true if we just look at the figures. The Minister appears incredulous—I do not deny that we must look at the figures, but we must also look at what lies behind those figures and how such a deficit has occurred. The answer is that the deficit occurred because of a sudden and dramatic cut in funding, which came without warning, over the last few years.

Were the Minister to examine the figures looking forward to the extrapolation of future funding, as well as looking backwards, it would become obvious that the deficit has been made up and that it will be further made up. Wansfell college is a viable going concern. It is a thriving business that makes money. It could be self-funding in its running costs. The argument that Wansfell college must be closed because its running costs must be subsidised is therefore simply not true.

Anyone who examines financial statistics, in any walk of life, knows that one can prove almost anything by figures. Certainly, one can prove that Wansfell college has been in financial difficulties. One can also prove, however, that because it is so popular it has no difficulty attracting people to its courses. People are willing and happy to pay the prices of those courses, and especially the residential costs—which are very reasonable and cover the costs of residential provision at the college. Because it is not difficult for the college to attract customers, it is not difficult for the college to make money. It will not be difficult in coming years for the college to attract people to pay the fees that it charges to build up even more of a profitable going concern. That argument is therefore simply not valid.

There is another problem, however, which is increasingly affecting adversely almost every aspect of life in the Epping Forest area and other similar areas in the south-east of England. I refer to land and property prices. One of Wansfell college's great attractions is its location, on the very edge of our beautiful, ancient Epping Forest. I am not biased when I say that Epping Forest is clearly one of the most beautiful areas in the country. That means that the land on which the college stands would be very valuable if it were sold for housing development, for example. If we go in the direction in which we are currently going, there will be an unsustainable balance in our environment. There will be far too many houses and no other facilities, because there is such a drive to sell land for housing development in our area. There will be no schools, hospitals, transport facilities, doctors, corner shops or any other kind of public or, indeed, private service provision. The Government seem to make finance, and nothing else, their criterion for environmental and social planning.

The Essex county council argument that is valid concerns the significant proportion of people who attend the college and come from outside Essex. I should say, to be fair to the council, that it is not its responsibility to provide education for people from all over the country; that is the Government's duty. By passing the buck to Essex county council, they are avoiding that duty.

It is no surprise, when it comes to issues such as this, that the Government say one thing and do another. Chapter 1 of the skills strategy White Paper—the Minister sighs, but the White Paper constitutes the Government's promise of what they will do for learning and skills councils and lifelong learning—gave a commitment. It said that the Government would > "safeguard the provision in each local area of a wide range of learning for adults, for culture, leisure, community and personal fulfilment purposes."

It does not just say, "We will provide training for jobs for 20-year-olds, or 19-year-olds, or 25-year-olds." The commitment that it gives sounds good, and it is good, but the Government do not follow it through. If Wansfell college closes, that will prove that they say one thing and do another.

As usual, the Government are blowing their own trumpet. In that same White Paper, they say:

> "During the course of the past six years, significant process has been made in our quest to make high quality lifelong learning a reality from the cradle to the grave."

They are taking credit for the progress that has been made, while at the same time halting progress at Wansfell college. If they stand by and let the college disappear for ever—if it closes now it will never be resurrected in any form—they will cut off an educational opportunity for a significant section of the population.

We must ask ourselves why the Government will not take steps to save Wansfell college. Why will they not direct the Learning and Skills Council, help Essex county council, or take over responsibility for a college that is an asset not just to Epping Forest and to Essex, but to the whole country? Is it because so many of those who attend the college are over 60? If there were discrimination on the grounds of race, sex or ethnic origin, that would be politically incorrect and not allowed, but discrimination on the ground of age does not matter. That will be proved if the Minister does nothing.

Are the Government failing to act because of location? Is that because Wansfell is not in the inner city and the Government want to put all their education provision into the inner cities, pouring money into certain parts of the country and ignoring other parts, notably Essex and Epping Forest? If the Minister thinks that Wansfell serves only what he might consider the leafy suburbs and the countryside of Essex, he is quite wrong. A large proportion of the people who attend Wansfell college come from inner London.

It is no coincidence that such an institution is on the edge of Epping Forest, because Epping Forest itself was one of the first facilities provided for the people of the inner cities. Queen Victoria gave Epping Forest to the Corporation of the City of London in 1882, and in the speech that she made in Epping Forest when she did so she said:

> "It gives me the greatest satisfaction to dedicate this beautiful Forest to the enjoyment of my people for ever."

Queen Victoria spoke those words specifically to encourage people to come out of the dirty city and enjoy the fresh air of Essex. Wansfell college is part of that historic, ongoing provision. It is a great asset, which is about to be lost.

I am not asking much of the Minister this evening because I know that he does not have the power simply to say, "All right, we'll keep it open." Although he cannot say that, however, I ask him for two things. The first is a delay in the closure of Epping Forest—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Of Epping Forest?

Mrs. Laing: I am sorry, a delay in the closure of Wansfell college. Epping Forest college is another matter—it is doing perfectly well.

I ask the Minister for a delay in the closure of Wansfell college so that it is not lost for ever this autumn. Secondly, I ask him to look at other ways of providing funding for institutions such as Wansfell college, which serve not just a local area but the community and the country as a whole. Will he consider ways of keeping open this valuable asset? If he does not do so, he is reneging on the Government's promises.

8.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing this Adjournment debate, although I do not congratulate her on leaving me only a short time—five minutes—to respond. There are few Conservative Members with whom I would like to spend such an historic evening, but she probably comes quite high up my list.

Where we agree is on the fact that Wansfell college has, over a number of years, provided extremely important learning opportunities to a wide range of people. I pay tribute to the leaders of that college, the governing body and the staff for their work to provide learning opportunities for many people, some of whom might otherwise have been denied them. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has mentioned a pleasant few days that he spent there some years ago, tutoring a maths course. He also told me about some of the excitement that he had, singing "Danny Boy" in the early hours and so on; he certainly has fond memories of Wansfell college.

There is significant consensus that Wansfell is a good college, with good provision, which plays its part in ensuring that we deliver high quality lifelong learning to people in that area and in our country. However, I must part company with the hon. Lady over her attempt to pass the buck and to deflect attention and responsibility for this matter from Essex county council, which has made this decision. I do not make a judgment on whether that decision is right or wrong, but it has been made by Conservative-controlled Essex county council, which the hon. Lady should surely have more influence over as the local Member of Parliament.

I will expand in a minute on the additional resources specifically being invested by the Government in lifelong learning. I would make the point to the hon. Lady, and through her to her constituents, that when the shadow Chancellor recently committed the Conservative party to future spending plans, he said that it would attempt to match the present Government on schools and the national health service. The consequences for post-16 education, for Sure Start, and for anything that is not schools within the education and skills budget, based on that commitment, would be horrendous—there would be no hope for colleges like Wansfell. Hon. Members should not come here and try to mislead their constituents by pretending that this closure is somehow the consequence of the Government's policy; the hon. Lady's Conservative colleagues on Essex county council have failed dismally to reflect the views that she expressed in this debate.

The hon. Lady says that the county council has had financial difficulties not just this year, when the amount that it has been awarded has increased, but in the preceding two years, but that does not stack up in terms of the history. In 2000–01, the college deficit was £50,000. By the following year, it had risen to £64,000. In 2002–03, apparently a difficult year, the college was given further additional funding of £37,000 by the county council to help reduce the deficit. It also paid the salary for a year of a full-time co-ordinator to help move the college forward in a year when, as the hon. Lady says, it was having difficulties. In 2003-04, the college has received a total of £93,500 in addition to its core funding of £103,000. The total shortfall carried toward from 2001–02 and 2002–03 was wiped out, apparently by the county council, at the end of the 2002–03 financial year, and in 2003–04 the college moved to the same funding formula as adult community colleges, which actually resulted in a 7 per cent. increase in funding.

The hon. Lady cannot come here and try to deflect attention. I quote her Conservative colleague, the cabinet member for lifelong learning on Essex county council, Bonnie Hart, who said:

"I have serious concerns about continuing to fund a residential college which isn't wholly benefiting Essex people. My remit is for Essex as a whole."

The Conservative council maintains that it is closing Wansfell primarily because of its deficit, but it also cites problems with limited disabled access, the state of repair of the attractive Victorian building, the fact that the college is full only at weekends and the fact that 59 per cent. of learners who use the college come from outside Essex. The county council has considered the case for Wansfell college very objectively, in a very detailed way, and has made a choice at a local level to close this college. What is dishonourable is for the hon. Lady to come here and imply—

The motion having been made after Seven o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Civil Service

1. Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): What recent discussions he has held with civil service unions about securing cost savings in the public service. [164980]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Ministers have met all the relevant trade unions. Yesterday I met the TUC General Council, when I explained the necessity for the 54,000 job reductions. I can now give more details of the specifics at the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise.

Of the 14,000 job reductions by 2007–08, 8,000 will be made by the Inland Revenue, 3,000 by HM Customs and Excise and 3,000 will result directly from the merger.

Following the Lyons review, of the 27,000 public sector jobs to be moved out of London and the south-east, 7,000 will not be replaced. Those changes make possible the release of more resources to the front line to benefit pupils, parents, patients and the general public.

Mr. Boswell: Although I share the Chancellor's view about the importance of efficiency, does not he feel, on reflection, that the matter could have been handled better, given the TUC's concerns about the likely collapse of morale and the possibility of knock-on failures in delivering front-line services? Why does the Chancellor go around like some sort of ruthless Victorian landlord, making eye-catching statements, apparently in an effort to distract the nation from failing public finances?

Mr. Brown: All the consultative procedures involved in the 54,000 reductions are being gone through, and that will continue. I do not believe that the general public or trade unionists in the civil service will listen keenly to the hon. Gentleman, whose party proposes real-terms reductions in every Department apart from Health and Education. That means that thousands of jobs in front-line services would go.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend assure me that none of the job losses will be in law and order, the defence industry or economic development?

Mr. Brown: I assure my hon. Friend that we do not propose real-terms reductions in the budgets for the Home Office or for defence, especially given the troubled, difficult and insecure nature of the times. Conservative Members may wish to reflect on the fact that cutting the defence budget and the Home Office budget at this time would put our armed forces, security services and police at risk. We will not cut the science or skills budgets, either.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): I am genuinely puzzled about the civil service plan—and I suspect that that may apply to the Chancellor, too. Between 1997 and 1999, he reduced numbers in the civil service by 15,000. Between 1999 and 2005, he increased them by 52,000. Now he says that he will reduce numbers again by some number—today we heard the figure of 54,000—in the next four years. However, at the same time he is hiring an extra 500 civil servants a week. What, in his view, is the right number of civil servants? What does the stop-go policy aim to achieve?

Mr. Brown: The last time the right hon. Gentleman was puzzled, he disappeared for approximately three weeks before returning to his constituency wearing a toga. He has not disappeared on this occasion, but perhaps his hon. Friends would wish him to disappear after his huge mistakes in his proposed Budget.

Civil service numbers will be fewer in 2007–08 than in 1997.

Mr. Letwin: By how much?

Mr. Brown: The latest figures show that they will be at least 40,000 fewer.

Mr. Letwin: In that case, why is the Chancellor currently hiring about 500 civil servants a week?

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman's figures are wrong. We have just announced 54,000 job reductions. They start almost immediately. Let me alert the shadow Chancellor to the table for the costs of civil servants and of administration. In the Conservative years, especially when he was an economic adviser to the Government, the costs of administration as a proportion of total managed expenditure rose to 5.7 per cent. Under this Government, they have fallen below 5 per cent. to 4.7 per cent. and 4.4 per cent., and they will fall to 3.7 per cent. by 2007–08. The right hon. Gentleman should apologise to the country, because his Government ran up enormous waste, especially the £2.5 billion cost of the poll tax.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): While I welcome my right hon. Friend's comments, does he agree that efficiency savings are also important to the users of services? Does he also agree that, if it is possible to devolve decisions locally, we get the benefit of local knowledge, local awareness of problems and a general improvement of the service, which Labour Members clearly support?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. Public services must and will be run efficiently as a result of the changes that we are making. The 2.5 per cent. efficiency savings that will happen every year, the reduction in the numbers of civil servants and the freezing of the cash budgets for administration will allow more resources to go to the front line. The dividing line between us and our opponents is that we want the resources to go to the front line and they want to cut public spending even in defence, law and order, science and skills after all the administrative savings are made.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Is the Chancellor aware of last week's Populus public opinion survey, which suggested that 57 per cent. of the public do not believe that there is any prospect of significantly reduced waste or increased civil service efficiency under this Government or under the Conservatives? How does he think that this mood of deep public cynicism will be affected by the Treasury's own response to the Lyons report, in which Sir Michael says that the "Treasury has been considering the opportunities for relocation as part of a rationalisation of support services"— and that it has come up with 18 jobs to be relocated to the provinces out of an establishment of 1,152? Is that not a splendid example of doing not as we do, but as we say?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman really should do his homework. The Treasury is responsible for the Inland Revenue and for Customs and Excise and, as far as I remember, a major part of the job relocation will take place within those two sectors. So, far from making a lesser contribution to the relocation of civil servants, the Treasury is making a greater one. The hon. Gentleman should think again before he puts a question in the way that he has done. The 101 spending commitments of the Liberal party will not convince people that the Liberals could make better use of public money than anyone else. He should take seriously the advice of his party chairman, who, after all, used to be the shadow spokesman on economic affairs, who told the party that it would not be treated seriously if it made public spending commitment after public spending commitment without having the means to pay for them.

International Finance Facility

2. Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): What assessment he has made of how an international finance facility would contribute to tackling poverty in developing countries. [164981]

4. Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): How an international finance facility would contribute to tackling poverty in developing countries. [164984]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer question 2 together with question 5.

Our proposal for an international finance facility would deliver the additional $50 billion a year needed to meet the millennium development goals. The proposal will be discussed in detail next week during the 8 April ministerial forum on finance for development in Paris, which I will co-chair with the new French Finance Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe that the Chancellor will be linking this question with question 4, not question 5.

Mr. Russell Brown: It is not like the Chancellor to get his figures wrong in any shape or form. Like him, I am aware that the global health fund for poor countries has now received pledges to the value of $5 billion. That will assist poor countries to stem the spread of HIV and AIDS and to deal with the many millions of deaths from tuberculosis and malaria. Will he seize the opportunity, when he is in Paris next week, and at his forthcoming meeting in Washington, further to enhance and enlarge the fund?

Mr. Gordon Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, both for his initial remarks and for his general point. In my defence, the figure that I got wrong did not affect money.

On the international finance facility, I can tell my hon. Friend that 50 countries will be represented at our conference in Paris next week. The three key areas in which we can make progress are debt relief, health—as he mentioned—and education. It is generally recognised that at least $10 billion a year is needed if we are to get every child into primary school in the countries in which primary education is not universally available. It is also recognised that, to tackle AIDS, TB and malaria, we would need an additional $20 billion a year. We also need to meet our commitments on debt relief. Therefore, the proposal for the international finance facility, which, I am grateful to say, commands the support of all parties in this House, is one that we shall pursue diligently with all our neighbouring countries. When we meet at the IMF and World Bank meetings later this month, I hope to gain support from countries outside Europe as well.

Mr. Hendrick: Each year, 7 million people die from avoidable diseases, and 115 million children do not get an education. More than 1 billion people live on less than a dollar a day. Given that we are unlikely to meet the millennium development targets for 2015, will my right hon. Friend tell the House how we will help those who most need it?

Mr. Brown: I know that when my hon. Friend was in the European Parliament, before he came here, he took a great interest in these matters. His figure of 7 million is absolutely right. Two million people a year die from tuberculosis, which, as everyone knows, is a preventable and avoidable disease if the proper inoculations and treatment are available. Two million die from malaria each year, and that, too, would be avoidable through a very small investment in mosquito nets, for example. Many people also die because anti-retroviral drugs are not available to deal with HIV/AIDS. I believe that we can make substantial progress between now and 2015. Aid is increasing, but it must be increased at a higher level, and it must be seen as investment in the future. That is why our proposal for the international finance facility, which makes it a condition of more aid that changes take place in the developing countries, but which is prepared through borrowing on international capital markets to raise the amount of development money available, is right. If we implemented it during the next period, we could meet the millennium development targets.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): One welcomes anything to help developing countries, but are we not in danger of setting targets that we cannot reach? The Chancellor will be aware that some people are concerned that the United Kingdom is among those countries that have not yet reached the 0.7 per cent. target for development aid. When is that likely to be achieved?

Mr. Brown: The development aid budget is increasing from 0.26 per cent. of GDP, which is the figure that we inherited in 1997, to 0.4 per cent. That is a big increase. If, however, we are to meet the millennium development targets, it will have to be through a co-ordinated effort by all the countries together. For us alone to raise our amounts of money would provide only several hundred million dollars extra, whereas to reach the additional $50 billion that we are talking about demands a co-ordinated effort. That is why we believe that for countries to come together and front-load development aid through an international borrowing facility is the best way forward. I hope that when the hon. Gentleman looks at the detail of our proposals—I know that he takes an interest in these matters—he will think that the right way forward, if we are going to make the speed of progress that is necessary, is to persuade other countries to join us in the proposed international finance facility.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Although we can all agree with and congratulate the Chancellor on his efforts to reduce international debt, does he agree that progress is slow? Can he confirm that only eight of the 36 countries expected to qualify for relief under the heavily indebted poor countries initiative had reached their completion point by last September? Under the circumstances, will he renew his efforts and try harder to achieve some results, rather than just talking about them?

Mr. Brown: That is grossly unfair. Of course we want to move faster, but the fact is that when we came into government in 1997, not one country—not one—was receiving debt relief under the HIPC initiative. There are now 27 countries receiving debt relief. Some are at completion point, and some—this will be covered by the next question—are just going through the process. Those countries got debt relief only because of the changes made in the process after 1997. I have always congratulated the previous Government on being involved in the first stage of HIPC, but the truth is that there are 27 countries getting debt relief now only because of the second stage of the process. The reason that there are not 37, as originally planned, is that seven of those countries, if I remember rightly, are in conflict, and three have governance issues. We should not give debt relief to a country where there is corruption until that has been sorted out, and the hon. Gentleman would not suggest otherwise.

The hon. Gentleman should take a more optimistic view both of the process and of what has been achieved by co-operative effort. He should ask his Front-Bench colleagues to reconsider their policy, which is to cut international development aid when it is needed most.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The Chancellor will know that only 38 per cent. of European Union aid goes to the poorest countries in the world, with much of it going to other countries for all sorts of historical reasons. If we are to meet our millennium goals, will we not need to persuade more of our European comrades that they must direct aid to the poorest countries in the world?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is absolutely right; he takes a keen interest in these European matters. It is essential that there is reform of the European overseas aid budget. We have been pressing for that for some time, and Finance Ministers in Europe are looking at the matter. It must be in everybody's interest that money goes to the poorest countries and the poorest people. I had hoped that we could get common ground in the House on the increase in the international development aid budget so that we could take our case to Europe and to the rest of the international institutions. Indeed, the shadow International Development Secretary said:

> "If we are to be taken seriously as a party of government . . . there has to be a public spending commitment".

Perhaps the shadow Chancellor will reflect on his party's policy to cut international aid.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): First, may I stress our support for the Chancellor's continuation of the last Conservative Government's debt relief initiatives?

I am sure that the Chancellor will agree with me on the importance to developing countries of securing the best possible terms in what are often difficult and rule-based international trade negotiations, and will bear in mind that the Geneva centre assists only in the event of trade disputes. Why, therefore, has he not supported our proposals for an advocacy fund to finance professional advisers of its choosing to help developing economies to secure better trade terms?

Mr. Brown: The issue is how that can be promoted—through a new fund or through existing institutions. I have already told the Leader of the Opposition that we are promoting it through existing institutions. I think it is difficult for the shadow Chief Secretary to propose an advocacy fund now. Until a few months ago, the Conservatives supported an increase in the international development budget, which would have financed either an advocacy fund or new measures to help with advocacy. It is difficult for the hon. Gentleman to suggest more spending now, when his party is committed to less spending.

The hon. Gentleman has just written to his friends in the City, stating explicitly—thus contradicting the shadow Chancellor, who is trying to say that there will be no defence, law and order or international development cuts, of necessity—

"It calls for real reductions in areas other than Health, Education, Pensions and Welfare over the next five years".

When the hon. Gentleman next asks me a question, will he correct the position of the party that now wants to cut overseas development?

Debt Relief

3. Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): What steps for further debt relief he will be pressing for at the spring meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. [164983]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Twenty-seven countries have already received debt relief under the highly indebted poor countries initiative, worth over $70 billion. In recent months, two more countries, Nicaragua and Guyana, have reached completion point, and more are expected to complete the process in the coming months. We have persuaded other donors to provide top-up assistance for Niger, and at the spring meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank I proposed that we extend it to Ethiopia and other countries so that they do not exit the HIPC initiative with unsustainable debt levels.

Ms Drown: I welcome my right hon. Friend's response, but does he agree that if sustainable debt relief is to be provided for the poorest countries, the attitude and ability of the IMF's new managing director will be important? My right hon. Friend will know of fears that the managing director will be appointed through horsetrading, behind closed doors. Does he agree that a key appointment of this kind should be made in a fair and transparent way, and that applicants from developing countries should be encouraged?

Mr. Brown: As my hon. Friend knows, I have taken some interest in the appointment of the managing director, purely in my capacity as chairman of the advisory committee—the International Monetary Fund Committee. She is absolutely right. After the appointment of the last managing director, who has resigned to become President of Germany, it was agreed that a number of procedures would be followed that would make for a more transparent process.

In my capacity as chairman of the IMFC, I am contacting all the countries and regions affected by this decision. We are sounding them out and asking them how they think we should proceed. I stress, however, that under the IMF's constitution the decision is made not by Finance Ministers but by the executive board of the IMF, which will itself decide when to trigger the process. We are trying, and will continue to try, to ensure that it involves more transparency.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Those of us who are fortunate enough to visit countries that have benefited from debt relief can see the transformation that it is already bringing about. However, we must find ways of communicating better to colleagues in Congress and other Parliaments in Europe our enthusiasm for these initiatives, and initiatives such as the international finance facility, otherwise there is a danger that we will merely talk and agree among ourselves. Does the Chancellor agree that we must somehow work out, as a Parliament, how to enlist the support of other parliamentarians throughout the world?

Mr. Brown: I know that, as Chairman of the International Development Committee, the hon. Gentleman has taken a huge interest in these matters, and has been responsible for the sending of a message around the world about the importance attributed by all of us in this country—Churches and non-governmental organisations as well as politicians in all parts of the House—to getting debt relief to work properly, and ensuring that international aid is well spent. I hope he will agree that organising a conference in Paris next week, to which 73 countries have been invited—we think that 50 will attend—is a step forward. I have spoken to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, of which some of us are members, about how it might convey the message to parliamentarians throughout the world. I shall be happy to meet members of the International Development Committee, or the hon. Gentleman personally, to discuss how we can make further progress. Let me again applaud the Committee's efforts to get the message across.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend answer the question that he himself asked at a conference on 16 February in talking about the Tobin tax and special drawing rights, which relate to debt issues? He asked whether there was sufficient will in the richest countries to agree to these profound changes. Presumably there is sufficient will in this country. What responses do we get from elsewhere?

Mr. Brown: I raised the Tobin tax and special drawing rights—the proposal of George Soros—and asked whether other mechanisms such as an arms tax or energy tax might make it possible to increase the amount of development aid. I concluded at the conference that the proposal with the best chance of success was our proposal for an international finance facility.

In each case, as my hon. Friend says, it depends on political will. For the first time in 20 years, international aid is rising rather than falling; that has been as a result of pressures from all over the world. Debt relief is now happening and there is a recognition that we have a duty and a responsibility to help with the health and education problems of the poorest countries. Progress is being made but, as a result of the Monterrey conference and the breakdown at Cancun on trade, people will be looking for another signal from the richest countries that they are prepared to do more. He is right that that is the signal that the conference next week—and other meetings, such as those of the IMF—must now give.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I was immensely encouraged a few moments ago when the Chancellor mentioned the role that the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association might play in this area. The chairman of the UK branch, myself and our secretaries met the Chancellor recently. How does he believe that that organisation, representing more than 50 countries—some very wealthy, some very deprived—can help to contribute to a reduction in world poverty and to debt relief?

Mr. Brown: I applaud the work of the hon. Gentleman with the CPA, which involves 50 countries. Of the 110 million children who are not going to school every day, more than 70 million are in Commonwealth countries. Therefore, we have a special responsibility to enhance resources for education and to deal with the problems that prevent money from being spent on education, health and economic development. Following the Commonwealth Finance Ministers conference—my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has taken a keen interest in the Commonwealth Finance Ministers group—we can do more to get our message across to parliamentarians in the Commonwealth. I should like to work with the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to do so. It is also true that we formed the Commonwealth education fund to celebrate the Queen's jubilee, through which money is going to education as a result of Government and private sector sponsorship under the chairmanship of the former Governor of the Bank of England, Sir Eddie George. There are many things that we can do and we are ready to work with the hon. Gentleman to achieve those goals.

New Deal for Skills

5. Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): Pursuant to his announcement in the Budget on the extension of the new deal for skills, if he will assess the benefits of developing short-term loans for those on low incomes seeking to move into better jobs. [164985]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): Alongside schemes such as our employer training pilots, adult learning grants, the new deal programmes and free training to gain a first level 2 qualification, the Government already operate a career development loan. We are looking at ways in which this can be developed through a new deal for skills so that we can help people into work and then get on in work.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. Friend appreciates that the transition from waged to salaried employment can mean that people have a three-week gap in their income. Does he accept that this disincentive to move into a better job also has a detrimental impact in ossifying the lower end of the labour market? Will he look at making specific grants available—as they are for people who go into work—to people going from waged jobs into salaried appointments?

John Healey: My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, my colleagues in the Department for Work and Pensions and I know how consistent my hon. Friend is in pursuing this point. He will know that existing survey data do not tell us conclusively that there is a disincentive. He will know also that more families and working households are benefiting from in-work support through the working families tax credit and the child tax credit. These are improving the incomes of low and moderate earners and increasing their ability to save and to cope with just the sort of transition about which my hon. Friend is rightly concerned.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Does the Minister share my surprise that economic activity is at its current levels, compared with 1997? I have an interest to declare, because my electorate made me economically inactive in 1997. Could that level be connected with the fact that roughly 1 million people are claiming some form of sickness or incapacity benefit because they are unfit for work? What will this new scheme do to help those people back into work?

John Healey: No, I do not agree. The fact is that more people are employed than ever before. Unemployment has not been at these levels since the 1970s, and in a modern society, job security and career prospects for individuals increasingly depend on their having the skills that employers need. We simply will not scrap the new deal, which has helped more than 1 million people into work. We will build on its success, and offer the new deal for work and skills in the future. This is precisely the time to be investing in the skills base for the future. It is precisely the wrong time, for the future economic strength and prosperity of this country, to cut apprenticeships, cut university places, cut further education courses and cut workplace training, which is precisely what the shadow Chancellor plans to do in his public spending plans.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): The Government have been extremely successful in getting people off unemployment benefit and incapacity benefit and into work, very often into entry-level jobs. If there is to be an answer to the question that the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) asked, we have to make sure that those in entry-level jobs move up the jobs ladder so that those who are still on benefits can move into work and take advantage of the new deals. Will the Government put the same amount of energy into ensuring that people move up the jobs ladder into better jobs, which will then create entry-level jobs for those who are still out of work, who can fill the gaps? That is the only way in which we can get more people, including those who are more difficult to place, into work.

John Healey: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Our concern as regards the new deal for work and skills is precisely that which she raises. We are concerned about the 7 million adults in this country who do not have a level 2 qualification. We are concerned to help those who are unemployed into work and then to help them to get on in work. We are concerned to help those who are employed to get advice on the skills and training that might be available to them, to improve their career prospects. That is precisely the sort of challenge that my hon. Friend sets us. She will know from the unemployment rates in her area in Aberdeen that, as a result of the economic measures that have been put in place since 1997, we are now closer than we have been for a generation to full employment in this country.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I strongly welcome the new deal for skills, and I welcome my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary's statement about the need for training, not only for the benefit of the economy but for improved productivity. Does he agree that to achieve that, we need a greater commitment from employers to the upskilling of their work force?

John Healey: Employers have a critical role to play, and it is the Government's role to try to provide the support and incentives that will help them. I mentioned the employer training pilots that we have rolled out this year to more than a third of England. The first-year evaluation of those shows that 70 per cent. of the firms involved have fewer than 50 employees—precisely the sort of employer that it has proved most difficult to help in the past. Some 40 per cent. of those employers have never had any contact before with a Government agency. Most importantly, three quarters of the learners now taking up training opportunities under the employer training pilots left school at or before the age of 16. That is part of the way ahead, and it is part of the future new deal for work and skills.

Child Care

6. Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): How much extra money he is making available for child care in the next spending review period. [164986]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The Government announced the 2004 spending review settlement for the Sure Start unit, which includes child care, in the Budget on 17 March. It allocated an additional £669 million in funding by 2007–08, compared with 2004–05. That is spending that the Opposition will cut.

Ms King: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. May I tell her, the Chancellor and the rest of the Treasury team that at a recent big conversation event on child care that I held in my constituency, the top priority that emerged was the need to encourage employers to provide more flexibility and family-friendly working? I know that the House of Commons will be unable to do that until the 23rd century or so, but if we could achieve it for the rest of the country in the next spending review, that would be fantastic. Will she also consider the fact that families eligible for tax credits lose eligibility for free school meals, which is a big symbolic problem for many in my constituency?

Dawn Primarolo: I am sure that the whole House will agree that more needs to be done to make sure that child care places are available through nursery education providers and employers. As my hon. Friend will know, the Government have announced the introduction from 2005 of a £50 a week voucher, which employers will be able to give to their employees, and a number of employers engaging in the debate acknowledge that that will help them with training and retention. I encourage all Members to publicise the development to their employers and in their constituencies.

My hon. Friend will also be interested to know that child care through tax credits is now worth £700 million a year. The idea of extending eligibility through registration schemes, so that more child care can be paid for through tax credits, is being developed by right hon. Friend the Minister for Children. We will discuss my hon. Friend's point about free school meals with the Secretary of State.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The availability of affordable, high-quality child care is very important, not least to working mothers trying to balance the many pressures in their lives. Has the Paymaster General read the National Audit Office report that was published in February, which pointed out that half those mothers said that their ideal type of child care was a playgroup or a pre-school? Will she explain why, despite all the extra money that she has just talked about, the number of playgroup and pre-school places has fallen by 22 per cent. since Labour took office?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman has a bit of cheek raising questions about child care at the Dispatch Box, given that the Conservatives propose to spend less on it. I remind him that more than 920,000 new places have been created since 1997 as a direct result of this Government's policy, and there will be a further 300,000 places and 1,700 children's centres by 2008. He may be aware of the announcement by the Minister for Children that the Government have introduced free part-time early-years education for every three-year-old, six months in advance of our target. All those things have been achieved through this Government's policies, which Conservative Members tried to frustrate at every opportunity.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I assure my right hon. Friend of the enormous support in my constituency for the progress that this Government have made in financing child care. Does she recognise, however, that more money is needed for the children's fund, which ran into difficulties this year, and that it is extremely important that funding be provided for contact centres? Will she consider providing extra funds for centres such as that at Headlands primary school in my constituency, where people can get before-school, after-school, pre-school and holiday care? People sign up for those centres when they are thinking of having a family. Women need such secure, high-quality child care schemes if they are to have real choices in life.

Dawn Primarolo: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her pursuit of the development of child care policies during her time in the House. I can reassure her in that, as I said, 1,700 children's centres are planned for 2008. In partnership with the extended schools initiative that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children is developing, each centre will be a single place for five key services: early-years education, child care, health, family support and help into employment for parents. The intention is to provide a comprehensive service, not only developing the child's educational needs, but ensuring that parents are able to develop their potential, particularly to return to work.

Exports

7. Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact on United Kingdom exporters of the value of the pound against the dollar and levels of growth in the eurozone. [164987]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): Export growth is expected to pick up significantly throughout 2004 and 2005. The lagged effects of sterling's weakening against the euro since 2002 and the expected pick up in euro area GDP growth are likely to boost UK exports to EU countries over the period ahead. UK exports are also being boosted by strong demand from the United States, albeit dampened by the recent weakness of the dollar.

Mr. Beard: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. Does she agree that it is desirable for the UK to reduce its persistent deficit in traded goods? Does she view increased exports to China, India and south-east Asia as a means of augmenting our capacity to do so?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is right to point to the recent strong and rapid growth in far eastern countries, but the primary effect on export growth in the coming years is likely to be as a result of strengthening growth in the euro area and strong demand from the US economy. If he consults the Red Book, he will see that the Treasury has predicted that exports will pick up and grow from 5.25 to 5.5 per cent. this year to 6.75 to 7.25 per cent. next year.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Does the Chancellor have an exchange rate policy of his own, or is he happy for it to be decided by the Monetary Policy Committee?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman should know that the best way to deliver a stable and competitive exchange rate over the medium term is to have a strong macro-economy, which is exactly what the Government have delivered.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): What would be the effect on exporters of any recession engineered by reckless public spending cuts? Is that not exactly what the west midlands experienced in the early '80s?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend might also like to consider what happened during the recession in the early 1990s. Clearly, the way to deliver a stable exchange rate is to deliver the lowest interest rates for 50 years, the lowest sustained level of inflation for 40 years and the highest level of employment that this country has seen since the 1970s.

Mortgage Regulation

8. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What arrangements he has made for the transfer of responsibility for the regulation of mortgages from the Mortgage Code Compliance Board to the Financial Services Authority. [164988]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): The Treasury, the Financial Services Authority and the Mortgage Code Compliance Board have worked closely together to achieve a seamless transition from the mortgage industry's voluntary arrangements to the new statutory regime.

Mr. Kidney: While others argued about whether and how there should be statutory regulation of mortgages, the industry got on with establishing voluntary regulation through the Mortgage Code Compliance Board, which had the good sense to locate its offices in Stafford. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is to the board's great credit that, in just three years, it has brought 67,000 mortgage professionals up to fully qualified status? Does she agree, as it prepares to pass the baton to the Financial Services Authority later this year, that the FSA's job will have been made so much easier as a result of the board's great work?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. As he knows, FSA mortgage regulation will benefit millions of consumers by ensuring that they receive clear and comparable information and appropriate advice about mortgages. He points to the record of the Mortgage Code Compliance Board in raising standards, and it is right to pay tribute to its work in that regard. I believe that the board also managed to improve the reputation of the industry, as a result of which the FSA has said that it can grant due credit to the firms that have been in good standing with the MCCB.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): We all accept that there has been a certain level of regulation in respect of mortgages and other matters. The Financial Services Authority investigates a range of matters affecting the industry, and it is important to restore full consumer confidence in it. We have heard about the 67,000 people who have fully fledged qualifications to deal with mortgages, but does the Minister believe that the principle of caveat emptor has been ignored for too long and needs to be re-established more firmly in her negotiations with the FSA—on mortgages and, indeed, on other financial products?

Ruth Kelly: We are practically in a unique position on mortgage regulation. It was called for not merely by the Treasury and the FSA but by consumer associations and, indeed, the industry itself. I think that everyone agrees that mortgage regulation will benefit millions of consumers. The FSA has approached the matter in line with its statutory objectives, on the basis of a cost-benefit analysis, to introduce a process that will benefit everyone.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that the Treasury Committee has been looking into endowment mortgages and the mis-selling in the 1980s and 1990s that was unchecked by any appropriate regulation. We concluded that, despite FSA regulation,

"buying any with-profits policy remains an 'act of faith' for consumers".

Will she continue discussions with the FSA on improving regulation to protect consumers of those and similar products?

Ruth Kelly: We welcome the Treasury Committee's report on endowment mortgages. Mortgage regulation is an important component in restoring trust in the industry. Looking more broadly at endowment mortgages and other aspects of the financial services industry, people can have confidence that the FSA is one of the leading regulators in the field and that, as firms move to the realistic accounting regime this year and next year, they will become soundly capitalised. We can look forward to a future in which people really have trust and confidence in the financial services industry.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): The regulation of the mortgage industry from October is a welcome step, but the Financial Secretary knows that the home reversion or equity release scheme is wholly unregulated. I am aware that the Treasury is holding a consultation exercise on that, but may I gently remind my hon. Friend to get a move on? There is an impending crisis in that field, and elderly people will be the most vulnerable in a market crying out for regulation. Will she take one step ahead of the game and ensure that such regulation is introduced timeously to tie in with the mortgage regulation starting in October?

Ruth Kelly: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his continued and sustained interest in an issue that I have discussed with him on several occasions. As he is aware, mortgage-based equity schemes can be, and are, regulated by the FSA. However, home reversion plans, which are not mortgage-based products, do not fall into the same category. When we first considered the issue, in November last year, we asked the industry for evidence of consumer detriment and it did not have sufficient to hand; so, aware of the risks involved in the selling of those products, we launched a formal consultation process to gather evidence. The consultation closed on 13 February, by which time more than 50 responses had been received. I am aware of the intense interest in the subject and I hope shortly to announce a decision on regulation in that field.

Whisky Strip Stamps

9. Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): What representations he has received from the First Minister on whisky strip stamps. [164989]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I recognise the strength of feeling about tax stamps, especially in Scotland and, both before and after the Budget, I discussed their introduction with the Scottish Deputy Minister for Enterprise and Lifelong Learning. Following the Chancellor's announcement in the pre-Budget report, I and Treasury officials have held almost 50 separate meetings with the industry and other interested parties, including the Scottish Executive and Members on both sides of the House.

Annabelle Ewing: I thank the Minister for his answer, but he will be aware that, last week, Scotland's First Minister expressed his disappointment at the Chancellor's decision to impose strip stamps on the whisky industry. He may also be aware that the Scottish Parliament carried a motion yesterday expressing its disappointment. The motion was carried overwhelmingly and had the support of all Labour MSPs. In the light of that, is the UK Treasury really prepared to ride roughshod over the voice of Scotland's Parliament, or will it now listen to the all-party consensus in Scotland and abandon the measures, which threaten vital Scottish jobs?

John Healey: There is not all-party consensus in Scotland; after the full debate yesterday, the Scottish Parliament did not pass the motion that had been tabled by the hon. Lady's colleagues. Let me read from that motion, as it is quite clear that the Scottish National party is looking to turn the legitimate concerns of the Scottish spirits industry into a campaign for tax independence. The motion said—

Annabelle Ewing: It was an all-party motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must let the Minister reply.

John Healey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Scottish National party's motion yesterday said that

"the Scottish Parliament should be responsible for the setting of all national taxation within Scotland."

That is in contrast to the views of my right hon. and hon. Friends; in contrast to those of the Scottish Executive; and in contrast to those of the Scotch Whisky Association, which recognises that we have looked hard for three years at all the alternatives to tax stamps. We must—and will—act to reduce fraud by using tax stamps. The interests of the Scotch whisky industry are best served by detailed work between the industry and the Government on the way that we design and implement the new system, following the Budget. That is what the industry and the Government are doing, and it is the right thing to be doing.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Minister agree that the matter is principally for Members of this United Kingdom Parliament? However, as one of the Members who represent—as you know, Mr. Speaker—Grant's at Girvan and Glen Catrine bonded distillery, may I tell my hon. Friend that there is still some disquiet about the introduction of the stamps? The Scottish Affairs Committee is undertaking an inquiry. Will he give an undertaking that he will hold off any implementation of the proposal until the Scottish Affairs Committee has made its report, particularly in relation to the operation of similar schemes in other countries?

John Healey: The Scottish Executive and people in Scotland who have a very active interest in the issue, such as my right hon. Friend, recognise and understand that they have no responsibility to protect public revenues and no duty to act to stamp out fraud—that is a matter for the UK Government. Faced with fraud on such a scale, it is our duty to act, and we will act. We will legislate in the Finance Bill, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said, but let me be clear that the interests of the industry are best served by helping us to design and implement the scheme in a way that minimises the cost to the industry. I recognise the continuing concerns, particularly north of the border, but it is in the industry's interests to help us to work out how we can best minimise its costs through the measures that we have promised to implement.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): In responding to the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), the Minister did not make it clear whether he was willing to wait for the Scottish Affairs Committee to produce its comparative study of the impact on other countries. Although he is right to say that we should tackle fraud, if the method that he proposes does not work, he will have put an unnecessary burden on a vital industry in Scotland. Does he recognise that the burden is not just about new equipment or cash flow as a result of having to buy the stamps; there is real concern, especially among the smaller manufacturers, about the ongoing costs of slowing down production lines and the fact that their businesses will become less efficient? There is no point in making businesses less efficient if the method does not achieve the goal. Will he therefore wait for the report from the Scottish Affairs Committee?

John Healey: I am well aware of the Scottish Affairs Committee's interest in the systems in other countries. Indeed, I followed with interest the programme of fact-finding visits that it has undertaken to the US, Ireland and the isle of Islay. I also look forward to spending at least a couple of hours with members of the Select Committee this afternoon, when they will have a chance to grill me to their hearts' content and at length.

We have considered the alternatives with the industry for nearly three years now. We will legislate in the Finance Bill to introduce a system of tax stamps, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware that we will also legislate in the Finance Bill to freeze the duty on spirits for the rest of this Parliament, thus effectively cutting the duty on a bottle by 36p over the next two years. On any calculation that the industry has produced, that will more than cover the compliance costs per bottle, about which he is concerned.

Poverty (Ogmore)

10. Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the effects of poverty in Ogmore of (a) the measures introduced by his Department since 1997 and (b) the measures announced in the recent Budget. [164990]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): Ogmore, like the rest of Wales and the United Kingdom, has benefited from a range of measures in this and previous Budgets to reduce unemployment and make work pay and to raise the incomes of the poorest pensioners and families with children.

Huw Irranca-Davies: My right hon. Friend will know that, sometimes, when faced with controversial votes, hon. Members will say, "I am voting with the angels." Does he think that those archangels of the socialist movement, Keir Hardie and Nye Bevan, will be smiling down on those who voted for the minimum wage, the new deal, Sure Start and other policies aimed at achieving full employment? Does he think that they would see any sign of redemption among Conservative Members who voted against those policies and who cling to outdated dogma about tax on the poorest?

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Smile they certainly would, but try as they might I do not think that they would be able to find much scope for redemption.

Employment

11. Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his aim to achieve full employment. [164991]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The claimant count is now 2.9 per cent—the lowest for 30 years. There are more people in work in Britain today than ever in our history. Our new deal for skills seeks to move us further and faster towards full employment.

I inform the House that today the Treasury is announcing appointments to the court of the Bank of England. Sir John Parker, chairman of National Grid Transco, has been appointed to the court. He will take over from Sir David Cooksey as its non-executive member early next year. I can also announce the reappointment of Kate Barker as a member of the Monetary Policy Committee.

Mr. Luke: I share my right hon. Friend's vision of full employment. Does he agree that a return to short-term policies of boom and bust would inevitably lead towards revisiting the horrific unemployment that we experienced in the 1980s and early 1990s?

Mr. Brown: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The challenge is to move towards full employment, and that means that every region and nation can benefit from employment opportunities for all. That is why, even at this stage, I hope that Members of all parties will support the new deal and the new deal for skills that we announced in the Budget. Those on the Conservative Front Bench should look at the success of the new deal. In the constituency of the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), only eight young people are unemployed, and only 10 are long-term unemployed.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I appreciate that the Chancellor is deeply wedded to the new deal. Will he look favourably at extending the new deal to 50-year-olds who lose their jobs within six months, when their confidence and morale is at its lowest? They cannot apply under the new deal for those six months.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for proposing that we extend the new deal to make it more accessible to the over-50s. I agree with her that we need to do more to help the over-50s, as we have by making it easy for them to get back to work. The issue that the hon. Lady has lies with the shadow Chancellor, who wishes to abolish the new deal. Perhaps he might listen to her and to the previous shadow Chancellor, who believes that the new deal has done a great deal of good, should be continued and should be extended.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): Unemployment in my constituency, where many people run small businesses, is down significantly, but there are not as many entrepreneurs in Yorkshire generally as there are in the south of England. What is my right hon. Friend doing to encourage more people to start their own businesses?

Mr. Brown: In fact, there are over 100,000 more small businesses than in 1997. More people are starting businesses and there is more help for those who do so. The Small Business Service has been devolved to the regions, and that should enable people to get more help to start businesses. I agree with my hon. Friend that creating more entrepreneurs and making it possible for people to start a business will help enterprise and the move towards full employment. She will note the importance of the new deal in helping people to get jobs or to start businesses. Surely it is time that there was consensus in the House on keeping and expanding the new deal instead of abolishing it.

Pensioners (Warrington, North)

13. Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): How many pensioners in Warrington, North will benefit from the £100 allowance announced in the Budget; and if he will make a statement. [164993]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Paul Boateng): The number of pensioner households with at least one occupant aged 70 or over in Warrington, North who will benefit from the £100 payment this year is around 7,000.

Helen Jones: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. The announcement in the Budget was welcome to pensioners in my constituency. What steps are the Government taking to ensure that all pensioners who should receive the extra allowance are aware of it and know when it will be paid, so that they can be reassured?

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will certainly be taking measures to ensure that all pensioners are aware of that to which they are entitled. I commend my hon. Friend for all the work that she does in Warrington to ensure that pensioners are fully aware of their entitlement. I know that she will include in that the recent reforms to council tax benefit, which will mean that more than half of all pensioner households could be eligible.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Does the Chief Secretary accept the TUC's criticism of the policy—that it is badly targeted not only because it will help wealthier pensioners, but because it will do nothing for people on low pay who have been hit by the increase in council tax? Is not the only answer to a bad council tax policy to scrap it and replace it with a fairer tax?

Mr. Boateng: No. The average council tax per dwelling in 2004–05 for Labour councils is £870. Let us compare that with £971 for Liberal Democrat councils and £1,072 for Conservative councils. So, we will take no lessons from Opposition Members in that regard.

Personal Statement

12.30 pm

Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston) (Lab): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a personal statement to the House.

Over the past four weeks I have faced sustained parliamentary and media criticism over our system of immigration controls. I understand why people feel so strongly about these issues—they touch on some of our deepest concerns about the security and identity of our country. I have done my best to answer honestly and directly whatever questions and allegations I have faced, and to ensure that we look hard at the issues raised to see where we might need to take further action.

I am confident that at all times I have acted properly and in the best interests of the people of this country, and I am proud of what I have achieved over the past two years. None the less, it has become clear to me that, however unwittingly, I may have given a misleading impression in my interviews on Monday night about whether any of the concerns expressed about the operation of clearance controls from Romania and Bulgaria had crossed my desk at any stage in the past two years.

On Tuesday, in order to prepare for the next phase of the Sutton inquiry, I asked for all the relevant files and paperwork to be reviewed in order to ensure that everything was correctly disclosed. During this process it was discovered that my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth) had written to me a year ago drawing my attention to pro forma business plans submitted by UK solicitors in Romanian and Bulgarian cases. I did, in fact, take action at that time on advice from officials to address those concerns. I realised that that was what my hon. Friend was referring to when he mentioned that correspondence to me briefly in the Lobby recently.

On Wednesday, having re-read the interviews that I gave on Monday, I realised that what I said then was not fully consistent with that correspondence. Once the full picture was clear to me, I asked to see both the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary to explain that I had decided that I could not continue. I have always said that in my political and my personal life nothing is more important than my integrity, and although I did not intentionally mislead anyone I have decided that I cannot in conscience continue to serve as immigration Minister.

I believe strongly that on an issue as sensitive as immigration—one so open to misunderstanding—there is a special obligation on me as Minister to set the highest standards, not only in my personal integrity, but in the policies that we pursue. I am proud of what we have done in turning round the asylum system, which has had huge problems over many years. I know that there is more to do in immigration. I know it will be done, but I do hope that in doing it we can strike a balance between the necessary rules and order and recognition of the contribution that many generations of migrants have made and will continue to make to this country.

I am enormously grateful for the opportunity to serve as a Minister during the past five years in the most successful Labour Government in our party's history. I am proud to have played a part in our achievements, and I look forward to continuing to work for our party from the Back Benches.

Last, but not least, I want to thank my family and friends, local party members and constituents, the Prime Minister and ministerial colleagues, and all my right hon. and hon. Friends in the parliamentary Labour party for their strong support, especially during recent weeks. I owe a particular debt of gratitude to the Home Secretary for his personal support and friendship over many years and the opportunity to work with him in government.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Cory Collusion Inquiry

12.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): I am sure that the House will have been impressed by the dignity of the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes).

At Weston Park in the summer of 2001, the British and Irish Governments announced their intention to appoint a judge of international standing to look at six cases—the murders of Chief Superintendent Harry Breen and Superintendent Bob Buchanan, Pat Finucane, Lord Justice and Lady Gibson, Robert Hamill, Rosemary Nelson and Billy Wright. Both Governments acknowledged that these were the source of grave public concern. The two Governments are determined that where there are allegations of collusion the truth should emerge. These murders were horrific events, causing pain to the families that still continues today.

In May 2002, the two Governments announced the appointment of the Honourable Justice Peter Cory, a retired member of the Canadian Supreme Court, to conduct the investigation. Justice Cory presented separate reports to the British and Irish Governments on 7 October.

I am grateful to Justice Cory and his team for their hard work and commitment. In undertaking this important task he has laboured long hours at significant personal cost. I am grateful to the families who spoke to him and to all those who made submissions to him.

In presenting his reports to the Governments, Justice Cory expressed the hope that his investigation would contribute to the very difficult task of achieving peace and reconciliation in Northern Ireland, and I share that wish.

I want to make clear at the outset the Government's unequivocal view that, without the professional and steadfast work of the police, Army, Prison Service and many others in the wider public service over many years, we would not have achieved the progress that we have made towards securing a permanent peace and an enduring reconciliation. That is, I believe, both a justified and necessary acknowledgement, which I warmly give to the House.

I am today publishing the four reports that were presented to the British Government—those relating to Pat Finucane, Robert Hamill, Rosemary Nelson and Billy Wright. In line with Justice Cory's terms of reference, the only redactions that have been made are those that were necessary to ensure that the privacy and right to life of individuals is protected, and that the Government's obligations in relation to ensuring justice and protecting national security are maintained. Redactions are clearly shown in the text of those reports. As agreed with the judge, redacted text will be placed in secret sealed appendices.

Justice Cory presented his reports on 7 October. They are extensive and in total are around 500 pages long. Since we received the judge's reports we have had to consider most carefully a number of important issues, as we said we would in the judge's terms of reference: national security, the protection of life, the criminal justice process and fairness to those named in the reports. In two of the four cases, police investigations or prosecutions continue, and in a third prosecutions were pending until very recently. We have kept in touch with Justice Cory throughout that process, and I talked to him yesterday.

We have considered carefully our obligation to ensure fairness to individuals. At our request, Justice Cory has added a foreword to the reports, which makes it clear that it was not his task to make final determinations of fact or attributions of responsibility, and his findings are necessarily provisional. I would, of course, have liked to publish the reports sooner, but the Government have a duty to ensure that they meet all their obligations, including fairness not only to the families, but to those who could be identified in the reports.

Justice Cory's approach has been to adopt a very wide definition of collusion that covers both inaction as well as action, and patterns of behaviour as well as individual acts of collusion. On that basis, the judge has decided that there are instances in each case where it could be provisionally found that there was collusion. In each case, he recommends that those questions should be examined and tested further in the course of inquiries. For that reason, the Government have not taken a view on Justice Cory's provisional findings, which he has reached as a result of his wide definition of collusion, but his reports raise matters that will cause serious concern. I agree wholeheartedly with Justice Cory's view that the public must have confidence in public institutions.

The Government stand by the commitment that we made at Weston Park. In the Wright case, there are no outstanding investigations or prosecutions, and the inquiry will start work as soon as possible; it will be established under the Prison Act (Northern Ireland) 1953.

In the Finucane case, an individual is currently being prosecuted for the murder, and the police investigation by Sir John Stevens and his team continues. It is not possible to say whether further prosecutions will follow, and the conclusion of the criminal justice process in that case is thus some way in the future. For that reason, we will set out the way ahead at the conclusion of prosecutions.

In the Hamill case, there are now no outstanding investigations or prosecutions, and the public inquiry will be set up as soon as possible under the Police (Northern Ireland) Act.

The police investigation in the Nelson case continues, but it is expected to end in the next few months. The Chief Constable has advised me that the establishment of a public inquiry would not prejudice the investigation, and the inquiry will therefore begin work as soon as possible. It will also take place under the 1998 Act, and it will examine the actions of the police and the Northern Ireland Office.

I recognise that the requirement in the Finucane case to wait until criminal proceedings are complete will disappoint some, but public interest demands that prosecutions should be pursued to their conclusion and that wrongdoers should be punished. As Justice Cory says:

"Society must be assured that those who commit a crime will be prosecuted and if found guilty punished."

The inquiries will have the full powers of the High Court to compel witnesses and papers. The powers are the same as those granted to inquiries set up under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921, under which the Bloody Sunday inquiry operates. In addition, the police and prisons Acts enable me, as Secretary of State, to make provision for certain matters—for example, costs and expenses.

I know that concern has been expressed in this House and elsewhere about the length and cost of some public inquiries. In particular, there are concerns about the cost of the Bloody Sunday inquiry—£129.9 million to date, with a predicted final cost of £155 million. I understand that unhappiness, but setting up that inquiry was the right thing to do, and I commend the work of Lord Saville and his team. Having been established, the inquiry must run its course if it is to be fair to individuals and if the truth is to emerge.

We will, of course, take all reasonable steps to control costs in the inquiries that I have announced today, including capping legal costs where appropriate. We will ensure that the inquiries have the maximum powers, as well as aiming for better, quicker inquiries. Even so, these inquiries will inevitably mean the commitment of significant resources. The Government recognise people's desire to see public funds spent on delivering better public services and effective policing. I recognise public concern about further expenditure on inquiries into the past.

This Government have shown repeatedly that the state is open to scrutiny for its actions. We established the Bloody Sunday inquiry. The investigation by Sir John Stevens continues and has yielded prosecutions. We appointed Justice Cory, with the Irish Government. Wrongdoers will be brought to justice. I firmly believe that the only way we can put the past behind us in Northern Ireland is by seeking to establish the truth; but that must be the truth about the actions of all those who have been involved in the tragedy of the past 30 years.

I started this statement with a warm tribute to the police, the Army, the Prison Service and public servants in general, and I underline that. Too many of those people have lost their lives to terrorism, and their sacrifice is not forgotten. However, Justice Cory's reports raise serious questions that it is right to address further.

I am under no illusions about the fact that confronting the past is a difficult and painful process. The Government and their agencies are ready to play their part. We need to find a way of remembering the past, while not allowing it to hinder progress in future. Northern Ireland needs greater reconciliation between the communities; that is where all our attention needs to be directed. We should ensure that we do not concentrate on divisive issues from the past at the expense of securing the future.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for his customary courtesy in letting me have a couple of hours advance sight of his statement and the reports from Justice Cory.

The allegations that gave rise to the right hon. Gentleman's statement are of the utmost gravity. The duty of our security forces is to uphold the rule of law. In performing that duty, they must be subject to the rule of law. I want to make it clear that Conservative Members do not, and never will, excuse or condone deliberate illegal acts by members of the security forces or others in the service of Government.

I have met bereaved relatives from both sides of the community divide in Northern Ireland. I know that their agony is real and that their grief and sense of loss is enduring. My fear is that the Government's actions announced today will not provide justice and will not help to build the reconciliation that the Secretary of State rightly seeks.

As the right hon. Gentleman said, three years ago the Government agreed to commission these reports and to establish public inquiries if that were the recommendation of the judge appointed, but the Weston Park agreement also talked of the need to decommission weapons and for all parties to support the police. Those things have not happened, yet today the Government press ahead with the implementation of what must be counted a foolish pledge to hold public inquiries into four selected cases of murder.

I have several questions for the right hon. Gentleman. First, on the report itself, will he confirm that Justice Cory looked only at documentary evidence; that he spoke to none of the people who are identified in his report; and that Judge Cory gave no individual the chance to comment on the criticisms that were made of him? Does the Minister agree that the judge has chosen a very broad definition of collusion that might cover poor management and error, as well as deliberate acts? Does he agree, too, that although the judge has not published the names of the people responsible for alleged collusion, he has given and published descriptions that will make it very easy for those people to be identified? Have the Government considered whether those individuals are likely to need some kind of protection?

Secondly, does the Secretary of State agree that it will be practically impossible for anyone who is the subject of the public inquiries to get a fair trial? Does not his decision, in effect, rule out the prospect of criminal prosecutions in the Nelson, Hamill and Wright cases? In the Finucane case, of course, a man has been charged and is awaiting trial, but, irrespective of whether that trial results in a conviction or an acquittal, how can it be possible or just to hold a public inquiry to examine an individual's conduct after a court of law has made its decision?

Thirdly, on the costs of the public inquiries, how does the Secretary of State propose to avoid the inquiries dragging on for years, like Saville, and costing millions of pounds that could otherwise be spent on policing Northern Ireland? Is he not in a cleft stick? If he puts a cap on either the time or the money, it will surely lead to allegations of a Government cover-up or injustice, and is likely only to add to bitterness rather than to heal it.

Fourthly, is the Secretary of State not uneasy about the selective nature of the inquiries that the Government have announced today? There are about 1,800 other unsolved murders from during the troubles in Northern Ireland. In 1989 alone, the year in which Mr. Finucane was murdered, there were 81 deaths, including the murder of no fewer than 35 members of the security forces. Their families still grieve and feel that justice has not been done. What hope and comfort do the Government feel able to offer the hundreds of families whose cases have not been covered by today's statement or the forthcoming inquiries?

Finally, would it not be the greatest travesty of justice if we let the alleged actions of a few denigrate and besmirch the collective reputations of the Royal Ulster

[Mr. David Lidington]

Constabulary and the armed forces? Surely those are people who for 30 years performed their duties to the highest standards of professionalism, courage and even-handedness against wicked and evil terrorists who were prepared to maim and murder at random in their effort to destroy the rule of law. They are the people who often paid the ultimate sacrifice in defending democracy for all the people of these islands. Are not members of the police, Prison Service and armed forces the very people to whom we and the huge majority of decent law-abiding people in Northern Ireland continue to owe the greatest debt of all?

Mr. Murphy: I agree that we must pay tribute to the collective reputation of the RUC, the armed forces and others who kept Northern Ireland afloat over the past 30 years and were able to ensure that some sort of normal life continued. I mentioned that at both the beginning and end of my statement, and I repeat it because it is important to emphasise the fact. I also agree that we cannot forget those who perished in Northern Ireland over three decades—the hon. Gentleman mentioned 1,800 people—and whose murders are unsolved. I know, too, that there is a strong feeling among people and bodies such as the Police Federation about the need to do what we can to find out what happened to the people in the RUC who died. It is by no means a one-sided affair.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Government made a pledge at Weston Park. It is important to honour the pledge and we stand by our commitment. Justice Cory held an independent international inquiry, so it is for him to comment on the nature of it. Those who have the opportunity to read his reports will get some ideas about how he carried it out. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the broad definition of collusion. The definition is indeed broad, and when people read the reports, they will understand what is meant by it.

On people who are referred to by letter rather than by name in the reports, there is a duty of care on behalf of the Government, agencies and the police to ensure that those who work for the Government in some form or another are protected. If and when inquiries are concluded regarding people who would have been found culpable of collusion, it is also the Government's duty to ensure that they are charged if they have committed any crime. The Attorney-General assures me that the only issue that carried a difficulty with regard to a trial was the one regarding the case of Mr. Finucane, although I take the hon. Gentleman's point about that.

I share the view of all hon. Members that we do not want hundreds of millions of pounds to be spent on the inquiries if that is unnecessary. We have chosen the vehicle of the police and prisons Acts to ensure that I have some control over costs and expenses so that that situation does not arise. However, we must of course have proper inquiries, and proper inquiries they will be.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I thank the Secretary of State for his customary courtesy in providing me with early sight of his statement. Liberal Democrats welcome the publication of the report, which has been a long time coming. The prospect of collusion is serious and destabilising in Northern Ireland, especially at a time when we are trying to create a unified cross-community security service that enjoys the trust of everyone there.

I am more than a little surprised by the Conservative party's position. It is clear that a Conservative Government would not regard Cory's findings as sufficient grounds for inquiries, but that is a serious error of judgment. Liberal Democrats would take the opposite view and say that the grounds are there for inquiries to take place.

I have three short questions. Is there any prospect of intelligence personnel or other witnesses being granted anonymity or immunity from prosecution, as was the case in the Saville inquiry? Secondly, what plans do the Government have to ensure that there is closure for others who have suffered similar losses and still feel that their grievances have remained unaddressed? In fairness, the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) said that hundreds of people feel that way.

Thirdly, and finally, the Secretary of State said that the Saville inquiry is set to cost £155 million. He talks about capping legal costs, so will he assure us specifically that that means that he will put a financial ceiling on the expenditure for the inquiries, and, if so, what is that limit?

Mr. Murphy: I have not yet gone into the detail, but if I find that the costs are becoming unreasonable I would not hesitate to do such a thing. However, we must always ensure that we have proper inquiries and tribunals.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for welcoming the reports. I repeat that the powers of the inquiries will be exactly the same as those of the Saville inquiry regarding people who work in the intelligence services and so on. I take his point about the unsolved murders across the board in Northern Ireland. I know that the Chief Constable is well aware of that and that he has a review team in his headquarters to examine unsolved murders. As always, of course, there is a problem with resources. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Policing Board has indicated concern that it needs the money that it currently has to engage in current prosecutions and investigations. It is obviously a potent issue in Northern Ireland. Although I share the hon. Gentleman's view about costs, we must ensure that we have proper inquiries.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): I welcome the Secretary of State's statement as an important contribution to sustaining the peace process in Northern Ireland and furthering the community's emerging confidence in the judicial and security position. The statement is vital from that perspective.

The Secretary of State said that collusion between the state and paramilitaries was outrageous. The six cases—the four that he announced and the other two, into the murders of Superintendents Buchanan and Breen and Lord Justice and Lady Gibson, which are within the jurisdiction of the Republic of Ireland—epitomise in the Northern Ireland psyche the alleged collusion between state and paramilitaries. That is why they are so important. That is not to diminish the pain, suffering, grief, trauma and continuing hurt that all the families in both our communities in Northern Ireland have endured in the past 30 years. The suffering continues. However, surely it is correct that cases that involve a belief that substantive collusion in murder has taken place between the state and paramilitaries are exceptional, and it is important that they are resolved as far as possible. As the Secretary of State said, the Government have made their decision in pursuit of the truth, not vengeance.

In establishing the inquiries, the Secretary of State appears to make a distinction between three cases and the Finucane case. We in the Social Democratic and Labour party fought hard and long at Weston Park for inquiries into the six cases to be established immediately. Will he undertake that, when the conditions are fulfilled for the Finucane case—that must be fairly soon—a similar inquiry will be put in train, as agreed at Weston Park?

Mr. Murphy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is important for hon. Members to realise that, without the constant work of my hon. Friend and his colleagues in the SDLP, I would not be announcing the inquiries into the cases of Hamill, Wright and Nelson today. As I have already explained, the Finucane case is different because of the approaching prosecution. It might be useful to quote the Weston Park commitment, to which I referred earlier. It states:

"If the appointed judge considers that in any case this has not provided a sufficient basis on which to establish the facts, he or she can report to this effect with recommendations as to what further action should be taken. In the event that a public inquiry is recommended in any case, the relevant Government will implement that recommendation."

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I note that the Secretary of State said in his statement that the three inquiries with which he is proceeding will be conducted under two separate measures: the Prison Act (Northern Ireland) 1953 and the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 1998. Is there any difference in style or power between the inquiries that will be held under the two measures? Will both sorts of inquiry fulfil the basic requirements that Cory set down on page 93 of the Wright report, which lists several criteria for a public inquiry?

If the Secretary of State has the power to cap, does that mean that the money will come from the Northern Ireland block and thus be taken from front-line services, rather than from the Exchequer? Will he accept the suggestion that it is better to set a ceiling now than cap later, when it may well be put to him that he is doing so because he is unhappy about the inquiries progress?

The right hon. Gentleman suggests that the Saville inquiry was right and necessary to get to the truth. Does he have any misgivings when some of those who called for it refused to answer questions at the inquiry, and indicated that they had a higher code—the code of the IRA?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman is right to ask about the nature of the inquiries and whether they are the same in what they can do. The answer is, of course, yes. Like the Bloody Sunday inquiry, they will have exactly the same powers under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921. They will have the powers of the High Court to compel witnesses to appear and papers to be produced. There is no difference in that respect.

I have not yet reached a decision about costs because we are only now announcing the inquiries. I shall take advice on the matter in the next few weeks and I shall take the hon. Gentleman's words into account. He is right to point to the difficulties that the Northern Ireland block could face in the effect on hospitals, schools, roads, transport and so on. I assure him that the money for the inquiries will not come from the Northern Ireland block, but it will come from the Exchequer and the Northern Ireland Office. Although that might not affect the services that the Assembly will provide when it is up and running again, it will nevertheless affect services to the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and join him in congratulating Mr. Justice Cory on his work in the past few months.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that the deaths are linked by the belief of the families and their wider communities that the failure of the police to investigate effectively can be explained only by collusion and the involvement of state agents in the deaths, and that that was determined by the need to maintain and protect informants?

Does my right hon. Friend also agree that, by those means, some elements of the security forces under successive Governments have contributed to undermining the rule of law, and that the process that we have created in the Good Friday agreement requires us to face up to our responsibilities? If we rightly expect paramilitary organisations to take responsibility and admit their actions, there is an even greater burden on a democratically elected Government, who are committed to the rule of law, to do the same.

What steps has my right hon. Friend taken to ensure the full compliance of all the military and intelligence services in the inquiries, given the examples of a lack of effective and willing co-operation in the Saville inquiry? What steps has he taken to win the support and involvement of the Finucane family? Barrett was arrested and confessed to Finucane's death in 1991. He was then recruited into special service and the tape of his confession was lost. What steps—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I gently say to the hon. Gentleman that he has put several supplementary questions to the Secretary of State? In fairness to other hon. Members, I must now ask the Secretary of State to reply.

Mr. McNamara: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is right to outline the importance of the families in all the inquiries. I mentioned in my statement that we recognise the grief and the pain that they have suffered.

As I said earlier, the Government are determined to find the truth about allegations of collusion. That is why we established the Bloody Sunday inquiry and the inquiries that we are considering. It is also why the ongoing Stevens inquiry was set up. I hope that there will be co-operation from other Departments and agencies to make the inquiries meaningful. I am sure that that will happen.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): I thank the Secretary of State for giving me advance sight of his statement. I have also seen the Finucane report but not the others. Looking at the report, I find it most unfortunate that Justice Cory seems to have failed to understand the circumstances and background of the situation with which he was dealing. I refer the Secretary of State to paragraph 1.183, which contains a slur—I hope an unintentional one—by Cory on Catholic members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. His failure to understand that there were a significant number of such officers in high positions is most unfortunate.

I also refer the Secretary of State to paragraph 1.304, which refers to:

"The Good Friday Accord and the Weston Park Agreement, which set out the selected cases as an integral part of the Accord".

That is quite wrong. There is a clear difference, in terms of the agreement. These cases were not in the Belfast agreement. They were not part of any agreement in that sense. Indeed, the Secretary of State will recall that there was a clear consensus in the agreement that the need in Northern Ireland was for a process of reconciliation. Yes, the past has to be dealt with, but in a way that does not add to the bitterness. That was clearly what was then intended. Unfortunately, however, the Government departed from that approach by agreeing to establish this inquiry process.

The references in paragraphs 1.256 and 1.259 to Finucane's background display astonishing naiveté by Justice Cory. His comments about Finucane ignore facts that were known to everyone in Northern Ireland. What steps were taken to give Justice Cory information about the nature of the situation in Northern Ireland, about how the police and the Army operated there, about how people such as Mr. Finucane operated and about the nature of his associations and contacts? Was anything done to try to explain such things to Justice Cory? That is an important point.

It is particularly unfortunate, in view of the very broad definition of "collusion" that Cory has adopted, that he should spread assertions—in fact, accusations—about such a range of people. The report contains a couple of paragraphs in which he attacks the former Chief Constable, Sir Ronald Flanagan. He does not mention him by name, but it is perfectly obvious to whom he is referring. He then makes negative comments about the special branch and the force research unit, and some sweeping comments about the Army and the RUC as a whole. As has emerged from the comments by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), no opportunity was given to any of those bodies to reply to the accusations that were made. Cory seems simply to have got a document in his hand and proceeded to give his interpretation of it, without knowing anything about the surrounding circumstances or the other considerations involved.

This is not a terribly good basis for governmental decisions, and I fear that the Government have got themselves trapped into proceeding in the way that they are now doing. I know that they have tried to mitigate the effect of Cory by getting him to insert a foreword into the report, and I hope that all right hon. and hon. Members will read that foreword, which contains a general withdrawal of specific accusations which, if they read the report by itself, would lead them in another direction.

I opposed the concept of having inquiries of this nature. They are contrary to the spirit of the Belfast agreement. Indeed, I personally warned the Prime Minister that arranging the Saville inquiry into Bloody Sunday would be a mistake, and so it has proved. It is a pity that that mistake has been reinforced, but if, as a result of this, the truth about Finucane and Nelson comes incontrovertibly into the public domain, there will be some side effects. I mention those two cases particularly because a lot of Wright's background and terrorist activities are in the public domain, and I leave out Hamill because there is no reason whatever to link him with others who have a clear terrorist connection. That does not come out—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the right hon. Gentleman that we cannot explore the full details of this matter today? This is a statement, and supplementary questions can be put to the Secretary of State, but we cannot have a full-blown debate. Perhaps another time.

Mr. Murphy: The right hon. Gentleman managed to make a fair number of points while he was on his feet. I very much welcome his comments about the foreword to the report, because it puts the matters into context. I am glad that he emphasised that to the House. In terms of the contents of the report, this was obviously a completely independent investigation and a completely independently produced report. It is therefore for Justice Cory to make his own comments on the matters that the right hon. Gentleman has raised. I emphasise that it is Justice Cory's report, not the Government's.

I accept the general thrust of the right hon. Gentleman's point about reconciliation being at the heart of the Belfast agreement. I know that, when the right hon. Gentleman has asked me what we should do about dealing with the past in Northern Ireland, I take the issue extremely seriously because more than 30 years of troubles, misery and death in Northern Ireland have produced some terrible things, right across the board, and it is very important that we move forward. However, we also have to ensure that we uncover the truth.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Looking back on my four years as shadow Secretary of State during the last Parliament, my greatest regret is that I supported the setting up of the Saville inquiry into Bloody Sunday. Does the Secretary of State accept that no good will come of that inquiry and that it is simply a huge waste of taxpayers' money? Because of that, and in the light of what my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) has said today, most hon. Members will have the gravest reservations about these new inquiries and about where they might lead.

Mr. Murphy: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, these inquiries resulted from an undertaking given at Weston Park, and the Government have decided to implement them. So far as the inquiry into Bloody Sunday is concerned, it was and still is the Government's view that the issue was so important that an inquiry had to be held. However, I have taken on board the points made across the House that there is a need to examine the costs and the time involved in these inquiries, and the right hon. Gentleman can rest assured that we shall do both.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): In relation to the inquiries that the Secretary of State has announced, will he accept that, first and foremost, they must be aimed at getting at the truth rather than at the furthering of any narrow political advantage? On costs, will he accept that the inquiries must in no circumstances be turned into long-drawn-out Saville inquiry-type sagas, with all the associated horrendous costs? Bearing in mind the thousands of victims in Northern Ireland, none of whom should be forgotten and who have already been referred to by hon. Members on this side of the House today, does he also accept that many people believe that there should be an inquiry into the role and conduct of those who aspire to government, like Martin McGuinness, for instance, and Gerry Adams, who are part and parcel of the IRA-Sinn Fein organisation, who are responsible for many of the unsolved murders and other murders in Northern Ireland? Let us take the Hegarty case and the La Mon bombing. Both those gentlemen are associated with both those incidents. Will the Secretary of State indicate what proposals he has in relation to those cases, and, for instance, in relation to the collusion of the Dublin Government at the time of the formation of the IRA in the late 1960s? When are we going to have those issues addressed, and what does the Secretary of State have to say about them today?

Mr. Murphy: There were a number of issues there, too. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, at the end of the day, the establishment of the truth matters above all else. I hope that these inquiries will do precisely that. I have already touched on the question of costs a number of times, and I share his view on that. Everyone in the House agrees that victims are not confined to one side or the other. I know that the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith), who deals with these matters, does a tremendous job in trying to deal with victims right across the different traditions in Northern Ireland. I accept the hon. Gentleman's point with regard to those issues.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the House that I am going to impose a ration of one supplementary question per hon. Member, as should be the case at all times except for right hon. and hon. Members on the Front Benches.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): As ever, Mr. Speaker, I shall be extremely brief.

Like all people of good will, I welcome the report and hope that it will continue to build on the successes of the Good Friday agreement; I hope that the boil will finally be lanced. In view of the fact that many right hon. and hon. Members have mentioned so many other cases, does the Secretary of State agree that this might be the time for us to consider establishing some form of truth and reconciliation commission, finally to resolve these problems?

Mr. Murphy: That may be the case. My hon. Friend is absolutely right that we must look to the future, and not look to the past all the time. There comes a stage at which it is counter-productive to keep looking at the past, bearing it in mind that blame can go right across the board. There is a case for considering a truth and remembrance or truth and reconciliation commission—call it what one will—but any decisions on those matters would have to have the confidence of everybody in Northern Ireland to be successful.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): With as much humility as I can bring to bear on this subject—

Mr. Pound: This will be good.

David Burnside: It will be good. With humility, on behalf of the families of 1,007 members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, the Regular Army, the Ulster Defence Regiment and the Royal Irish Regiment, may I ask the Secretary of State why is there not a truth commission in Northern Ireland? Does he agree that the main problem with having a truth commission, which, I hope, will bring to an end the conflict, is the inability of the Provisional IRA, Gerry "I've never been in the IRA" Adams and Martin McGuiness to tell the truth rather than deal in lies? Is that not the major difficulty in relation to setting up a truth commission to deal with the problems and bereavement of the families of those 1,007 members of our security forces?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman is right to point out to the House that more than 1,000 families are affected, whose members were in the police, the Army or other public service. They suffer, too, and there are no public inquiries into their deaths. Obviously, it is important to try to find out who committed the murders, but we must not in any sense undervalue the significance of the grief and pain that those families have undergone. I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman on that. As far as the truth—or whatever one wants to call it—commission is concerned, it is right that all parties in Northern Ireland should consider what their attitude to such a commission should be. I am sure that that would apply to all the political parties that currently have representation in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): The Secretary of State says in paragraph 8 of his statement that the Government have considered carefully their obligation to ensure fairness to individuals. Where is the fairness in the Government making public allegations of suspected criminal collusion against identified or identifiable individuals who were not given an opportunity by the Cory inquiry to deal with those allegations?

Mr. Murphy: The Government, of course, are making no allegations. We will decide what to do when the inquiries have been completed. I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman listened to what the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) said about the foreword in the report, which makes it clear that those are not allegations in the sense to which he has just referred. It is important that people understand that. Even though people are not named in that respect in the report, they are referred to by letter, and clearly we had to ensure that that foreword was included to provide those safeguards.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): The Weston Park talks to which the Secretary of State referred also brought forward a proposal for an amnesty for on-the-run terrorists belonging to the Provisional IRA. Does he understand the deep sense of hurt felt by many victims in Northern Ireland at the apparent hierarchy of victimhood? One the one hand, we have inquiries into some who have lost their lives during the troubles, and on the other, under the Government's proposal, we will allow terrorists who have committed some of the worst atrocities in Northern Ireland, including the Enniskillen bombing—the poppy day massacre when people lost their lives during an act of remembrance—to be granted an amnesty. When will the Government treat victims with fairness and impartiality, because it seems that that is not happening?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman is aware, of course, that the decision regarding on-the-runs would have to be taken in the context of acts of completion, to which the joint declaration referred. The Government would not do it in any other context. As far as his other general point is concerned, I agree in the sense that victims are not on one side or the other. In the case of most victims in Northern Ireland, their names would not be known outside their families or friends, but they were victims nevertheless. We must remember them on such an occasion, in the same way that we remember others.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): It is all very well the Secretary of State praising the armed forces, police and Prison Service, who are public servants doing a very difficult job under dangerous circumstances. It is all very well him saying in his statement that the Government seek to establish the truth about the actions of all those involved in the troubles. But the perception is different, as we have heard from the Unionist Benches and elsewhere. The perception is of a Government bending over backwards to accommodate Sinn Fein and the IRA. If we are to have inquiries, and if we are to seek the truth, will the Government take up the cudgels on behalf of public servants, to whom they owe a duty of care, and who were murdered in the course of their duties protecting this country, and have an inquiry into the collusion and activities of Adams and McGuiness and other IRA people who may have murdered British public servants, and perhaps an inquiry into Warren Point and other unexplained and unresolved massacres?

Mr. Murphy: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the inquiries are about establishing the truth about collusion, and the state has a deep responsibility to try to find out the truth in that respect, whoever did it. He is right to point out that not only those people with whom we are dealing today but many thousands of others have died in the troubles in Northern Ireland, across the board and across the political divide. Everybody in the Chamber will have heard what he said, and a number of Members have already indicated that they agree with the points that he made.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I am sure that no one on either side of the House would condone a policy of extra-judicial killings. Will the Secretary of State bear in mind, however, that many of those who served in the security forces in Northern Ireland in the late 1980s and early 1990s did so in the belief that they were fighting a war, and that they were doing so against a terrorist organisation that was extraordinarily well financed and armed, that had the ability to fade back into the civilian population at will, and was widely regarded as the most successful and brutal terrorist organisation in western Europe at that time? Will he ensure that this inquiry is conducted against that backdrop, remembering that, rather than judging by the standards of today?

Mr. Murphy: Obviously, the way in which the inquiry is conducted will be a matter for the tribunal. The people who chair these tribunals must, first, have the confidence of people right across the political divisions in Northern Ireland—otherwise, it would be pointless—as well as a keen understanding of what the hon. Gentleman rightly refers to. Over three decades, some terrible things happened in Northern Ireland. More than 3,500 people perished in Northern Ireland in 30 years, and there are some terrible tales to tell. I am sure that the people engaged in these tribunals will be very much aware of the point that he rightly makes.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Can the Secretary of State be more precise about the attempt by the Government to put a cap on the cost of the inquiries? He alluded to the cost of the Saville inquiry and will be aware that allusion was made this week in the national press to the fact that, arising from the Bank of Credit and Commerce International collapse, additional tens of millions of pounds may be expended on the Saville inquiry.

Mr. Murphy: No, I cannot, because I have not yet considered the detail of it. One of the reasons why we have decided to use these particular Acts of Parliament is that they provide me with the opportunity to cap and to look carefully at costs and expenses. There must always be a balance in terms of ensuring that the tribunal has a proper opportunity to discover the truth and is working properly, and at the same time ensuring that the public purse is not forgotten because, as other Members have said, if we take money from one part of our budget, less will be spent on other aspects of public services. That is an important factor. We will be looking in detail at the matter.

FCO Travel Advice

1.29 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about the review of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's travel advice, which I am publishing today as a Command Paper.

Given the constant rise in international travel and in the face of the threat from global terrorism, FCO travel advice is used more and more and is rightly under more scrutiny than ever before. It must be timely and consistent, and must carry public confidence. Much has been done in recent years to improve the quality of the advice, but I believe that we can do more. I therefore announced a review of it to the House in a written statement on 10 December last year. In summary, its terms of reference were to review how FCO advice could best help British travellers to make informed, responsible decisions about possible risks overseas, particularly from terrorism; to assess the proper balance between information, warning and advice, and assess how they could best be presented; and to assess the wider implications of travel advice—in particular how, in responding to a terrorist attack, we can ensure that prudent precaution does not become overreaction, which risks playing into the hands of the terrorists.

The review process included wide consultation with those who have a stake in the travel advice, including parliamentarians, the travel and insurance industries, users of the FCO website, the media, British businesses working abroad, victims of terrorism and their families, and destination countries.

Travel advice is an important and growing public service. British people made almost 60 million trips abroad in 2003, three times as many as 20 years ago, and more than 15 million UK nationals live overseas. Every week the travel advice pages on the FCO website receive an average of 280,000 hits, and 1,600 people receive travel advice through our telephone call centre. Alongside the continuing growth in travel, however, has come the rise of international terrorism, which aims not only to take innocent lives through indiscriminate attacks but to spread a general sense of fear and instability in order to undermine our freedom and prosperity.

Our travel advice must inform people of the threat from terrorism, and when the threat is acute it will inevitably lead to some disruption, but at the same time we must ensure that we do not do the terrorists' job by causing too much of the very disruption that they seek. Our intelligence services, the police and all concerned with public safety work extremely hard to discover and disrupt terrorist plans and to break up the networks that support terrorism; but it is in the nature of intelligence on terrorism that sometimes nations will not have enough knowledge to prevent attacks, as we saw only too tragically in the outrages in Madrid on 11 March. When we do have specific evidence of extreme and imminent danger from terrorism abroad, we will of course warn British nationals against travel, but in the case of a general threat issuing a prescription against travel will, I believe, only achieve widespread disruption, which is exactly what the terrorists want. It is unlikely to make people safer.

We in Britain lived for 30 years with the threat of Irish republican terrorism. Our response was to be alert to danger, to take sensible precautions and to make our own informed judgments about the risk. At the same time, we did not let normal life come to a halt. Indeed, letting normal life go on as much as possible was itself a weapon against the terrorists. Our travel advice needs to strike that important balance, making public safety its prime concern while minimising the disruption that terrorists wish to cause. We must give people the information that they need in order to remain vigilant and make judgments about risk and security, as they have to do every day, while allowing normal life to continue to the greatest possible extent. We must also ensure that our responses to terrorist incidents and threats are consistent. The public and all those with a stake in our advice need reassurance that our approach is rigorous, and based on a sound assessment of intelligence and a balanced approach to the risk.

We are bound to reflect on charges that the approach has sometimes varied. In the aftermath of the bombing of the British consulate general in Istanbul in November, for a period—on my authority—we advised against all but essential travel to major cities in Turkey. That was consistent with our current approach, but the Turkish Government made representations to us that no such prescriptive advice was issued in the aftermath of the 11 September 2001 atrocities in respect of travel either to New York or to the rest of the United States.

Although by its nature the threat and the fear of terrorism are hugely amplified by any one incident, it is by no means the main cause of death abroad of United Kingdom citizens, as notified to our posts. In 2002, according to figures that can be found in the consultative Command Paper, 1,427 British citizens died abroad. Of the 316 who died from non-natural causes 158 died in road accidents, 62 in other accidents and 29 as a result of terrorism.

On the basis of the arguments that I have set out, including the crucial balance between danger and disruption, the review recommends that in the case of intelligence-based terrorist threats we should first give the best possible and most timely description of the terrorist threat, both global and by country, so that travellers can make informed judgments and take appropriate precautions. Secondly, we should only go further and warn against travel in situations of extreme and imminent danger—that is, if the threat is sufficiently specific, large scale or endemic to affect British nationals severely.

We all live with the threat of global terrorism. Our response must be not panic but commonsense precautions. The public will only trust our advice on the terrorist threat, first, if they do not think that we advise against travel on the slightest pretext in order to cover our backs, and secondly, if they feel confident that any specific, credible threat that might affect their travel or their behaviour overseas will be conveyed to them. The review recommends that we ensure that our warnings have real teeth by confining them to specific, large-scale and imminent threats, while in other situations giving people the information that they need in order to make informed judgments about the risks they may face and the precautions they can take. We will of course continue to warn against travel, when appropriate, for reasons not based on intelligence on terrorism—for example, when the danger stems from civil disturbances, coups or other causes. That includes geological causes such as earthquakes and volcanoes.

This and the other recommendations and conclusions of the review are, I believe, well argued and persuasive. As I have said, they reflect widespread consultation. Given the importance of the issues, however, I want to ensure that everyone with an interest has the chance to have their say before I make any changes. I therefore invite Members of both Houses, along with all those with a direct interest in travel advice, to offer their views on the review and on the quality of our advice more generally. That further period of consultation will continue until the end of this month. I shall then announce appropriate revisions to our travel advice system in Parliament.

I look forward to hearing Members' views in the coming weeks.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): I thank the Foreign Secretary for allowing advance sight of his statement and the Command Paper. We are grateful to him for attempting to grasp an issue that is so important to the millions of Britons who travel abroad each year. Particularly in view of that, I welcome the month that has been set aside for consultation, as this directly affects our insurance and travel industries. Let me also express our appreciation to all the Foreign Office personnel and others who have contributed, and pay tribute to those—all too often unsung—who must make difficult assessments and decisions. I refer to our dedicated and professional consular staff abroad.

There is always a balance to be struck between giving adequate warning of risks to the travelling public and avoiding unnecessary anxiety, or damaging the travel industry and the economies of holiday or business destinations. Concern about the way in which travel advice is compiled and disseminated is especially relevant following Bali and Mombasa, after which the emphasis on safe travel took on a new meaning and a new importance. Advice must not be ambiguous, but it is equally important for it not to be so blunt as to cause unwarranted panic. We must not allow the destructive forces of terrorism an easy victory. After all, it is their aim to cause panic and instil fear, and disrupt the normal patterns of life. I am aware of the sheer volume of information that our intelligence services gather each day. Anything that improves that sifting process is to be welcomed.

Many in this House will know personally of what has become something of a rite of passage for so many young people; namely, to take off to the four corners of the earth during their gap year. Mobile telephone and e-mails are not always available to contact anxious parents, so great reliance is placed upon travel advice to warn or reassure them, particularly in the event of any terrorist threat or attack.

Although we are to have the consultation period, I wish to highlight a number of points for consideration. Before we move on to the issues arising out of terrorist threats, the whole House will be aware of the somewhat less-than-perfect behaviour by young Britons in certain Mediterranean resorts. The understandable reaction of the local communities is to demand rigorous police action. Does the Secretary of State agree that websites should clearly indicate the extent of the draconian action now being undertaken by local police if excessive antisocial behaviour occurs?

May I encourage those who draw up the FCO country websites to continue to clearly emphasise specific dangers such as road safety, health risks and crime, while highlighting particular cultural sensitivities and any lists of objects that may not be imported or exported?

Having today looked at the Foreign Office website, I ask the Foreign Secretary to agree that it is crucial that it be made graphically clear daily, on the front page of the travel advice section, which if any countries have had a change in their status recently. There are important insurance implications. Already, terrorist-related events are excluded from nearly all UK travel insurance policies, but given that UK travel insurance policies are also not valid in prescribed countries, the advice should contain much more explicit information, explaining that personal liability will occur in case of, for example, even personal injury when travelling within these countries. Does the Foreign Secretary agree that that must be marked clearly on the front page of the FCO travel advice website and in any supporting literature, stating that in these circumstances travel is entirely at one's own risk?

Has the Foreign Secretary been satisfied in his conversations with the Association of British Travel Agents and the travel industry that travel agents are, in practice, directing their clients to FCO travel advice where appropriate? Is he aware of just how anxious the travel industry is to have the clearest possible directions?

In the review, will the Foreign Secretary continue to look at the way in which other countries assess their travel advice? Will he work co-operatively with other Governments to ensure that there are no glaring disparities of view about terrorist threats and, where there are, seek to try to find ways to reconcile these differences, which in the past have been highlighted and can cause later recriminations?

Of course we will work with this review, study it closely and, as necessary, respond further to it. We shall never know how many lives it will save, but we will know all too well the consequences if we get it wrong.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his constructive approach to the document. If we are to ensure that the advice has integrity and authority, it is crucial that it should not become a partisan matter; the tone of his remarks suggests that there is no danger of that. There may be differences of view, which is precisely why I came to the House today.

I am grateful also for the hon. Gentleman's tribute to our consular and other staff abroad, and to staff in the Foreign Office. There are difficult judgments to be made. Obviously, officials from the Joint Terrorism Assessment Centre, the Foreign Office and all Departments offer Ministers advice, but Ministers are responsible for the content of travel advice and are answerable to the House for it.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the less-than-perfect behaviour of British teenagers abroad.

Mr. Spring: Not only teenagers.

Mr. Straw: And not only abroad, in my experience. From recollection, we give a lot of advice about the nature of local law enforcement, but I will check on that.

The hon. Gentleman suggests that the home page of the FCO website should make graphically clear whether the travel advice in respect of an individual country has been changed significantly in the recent past. That is a good idea which I will follow through; I will let him know if it is not possible for some reason. He suggested also that we add a rider about insurance on the home page. There is a limit to what can go on the home page but, in my judgment, of the two, it is more important to highlight the changes rather than to refer to insurance.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the practice in other countries, about which there is a passage in the document. We work closely with other countries, but it is important that we do not get into a situation where we substitute the lowest common denominator of other countries for our judgment. It is inevitable that if there is a terrorist outrage, relatives and friends of the victims will look to see whether it could have been avoided and at what other countries advised. I fully understand that. It is for each Government—in this case, for each Foreign Secretary—to make their own judgment, to have that judgment made public and to be answerable for it. I am seeking to provide a better and, to a degree, more scientific basis for the judgment to be made.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I welcome the advice, but within the fairly broad ambit of the review, will my right hon. Friend consider the circumstances of Kashmir? Enormous improvements have taken place in that beautiful country, which is now far more peaceful; yet the tourists and travellers whom it desperately needs do not visit because of the FCO travel advice. I do not need to remind my right hon. Friend of the immense improvements that have taken place, and of the work of Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee and President Musharraf. Will he consider the circumstances of a country that could benefit so much from a recasting of the FCO travel advice?

Mr. Straw: I understand my hon. Friend's point, and we have no interest in advising against travel except where we think the circumstances and evidence justify it. At the moment, we recommend against all travel to Jammu and Kashmir—on the Indian side of the line of control—except Ladakh via Manali, or by air to Leh. It is not the whole of the state; it is a substantial part of it. We all want the peace process to continue, therefore I will not say that we will have the advice changed. But I will ask for a further security assessment to be made of the current conditions in Jammu and Kashmir.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): I thank the Foreign Secretary for the statement and welcome the period of consultation that he announced. I have sympathy with the Foreign Office on the subject of travel advice because, to use a colloquialism, it is damned if it does and damned if it does not. That makes the crucial balance between danger and disruption to which he referred in his statement all the more difficult to strike, not least because the risks to UK citizens may be of an entirely different degree in certain circumstances as compared with the risks to citizens of other countries, even within the EU. Does he agree that in order to strike that balance successfully, we need constant monitoring and informed, sensitive judgment from competent, qualified and experienced staff, not least because of the possible effect on personal insurance provisions that individuals may have taken out, but also because of the possible impact on fragile tourist economies?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. and learned Gentleman puts the dilemma facing us acutely and he is right that it is our duty to make these judgments. There has been a significant improvement in the overall assessment of intelligence, which now takes place within JTAC. It will never be perfect, but the quality of assessment is much better and is now regarded as something of a world leader. Of course we have to take into account the risks to UK citizens rather than to others, but we must not slide into the idea suggested by some—although not by the right hon. and learned Gentleman—that because we have been prominent in the so-called war against terrorism, we are more likely to be victims. It is very interesting that the German newspapers last Thursday were full of a story that received not a line in British newspapers, but which was of real significance. It was headline news there that the German President Rau had to cancel a state visit to Djibouti in Africa because of a specific threat to him and his entourage from al-Qaeda based terrorists. That led to interesting debate in Germany, which continues, on whether the Germans have been too complacent in believing that because they took a different view from us over Iraq, they have some sort of immunity.

Let us be clear: as far as those terrorists are concerned, no one has immunity who is not a fully signed-up adherent to their wholly distorted view of the world. Everyone else, including people of the Muslim faith as well as those of other faiths, is an apostate and heretic and, from their point of view, should be a victim.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked about constant monitoring. Yes, we carry that out, but we can always improve.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I warmly welcome the Foreign Secretary's statement and the fact that there will be an additional consultation period. Will he comment on current Government policy on consultation with friendly Governments when travel advice is to be altered? I am thinking in particular of Yemen. Although it is working hard in the international community to combat terrorism, travel advice on that country has changed over a period of time, making it difficult for people to visit it or keep up contacts with it. Will he comment on the situation in Yemen in the light of what he has said today?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that. Current advice on Yemen advises against all travel except on essential business. I cannot say what new judgment we will come to if it is accepted that we will move to the new criteria proposed in the Command Paper, but if we make that move, I should want the extent to which local law enforcement agencies are willing and able to fight terrorism to be taken into consideration. We already recognise the considerable work done by our friends in the Yemen Government and their agencies.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I welcome the statement and the policy outlined, and I realise what a difficult matter this is. Can the Foreign Secretary tell us whether Bali, Spain or Turkey were on the list of countries at risk before the terrorist outbreaks there, or will it always be the case in practice that we will react rather than foresee?

Mr. Straw: There was general advice in respect of Spain because of ETA terrorism, and the Foreign Office general travel advice contains a page about the threat from international terrorism. On Bali, part of the later examination of events there looked at whether the Foreign Office's travel advice had properly reflected available intelligence, and whether that had been used properly. We were subject to some criticism on that, which I accepted when I made a statement to the House in autumn 2002. The Intelligence and Security Committee made some specific recommendations, which we have followed through, and which are among the reasons for upgrading the system. We continue to work those through.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I welcome, as have other Members, the Foreign Secretary's statement and the consultation process that he is about to enter. Will he consider another aspect of travel: advice given to overseas citizens on travel to this country? Many such people seem wholly unaware of our immigration rules, and I hope that our overseas posts can make greater use of local press and television to make quite clear what our rules and regulations are, so that no one is taken by surprise if they happen to be turned back at a port of entry in this country.

My other point is that if there is to be an order of priority in the security of our citizens overseas, surely the security of our diplomats in overseas posts should come first. They are not travelling abroad voluntarily as tourists, but are there as part of their official duties. I hope that the Foreign Secretary, following events in Istanbul and what I believe was the recent temporary closure of our embassy in Syria, will look after his civil servants overseas as a matter of priority, before worrying about voluntary travellers going overseas from this country.

Mr. Straw: First, I congratulate the hon. and learned Gentleman on the ingenuity of his opening question. Although it was not directly on this point, I have to say that my Indian and Pakistani constituents and their families are well aware of the immigration rules, and that 99 per cent. of them follow those rules and accept the decisions made. Some do not, which is why there have to be effective scrutiny systems, but on the whole, those work well—although sometimes, as we know, they do not.

On the question of the security of posts, I take that extremely seriously. I did so before the appalling atrocity against the British consul general, Roger Short, and his staff in Istanbul on 20 November, and I do so today. A review of security is taking place as a result of the Istanbul bombings, but quite a lot was being done before that. However, I make the point that there is no contradiction between our concern for the security of our staff—to whom we have a high-level duty of care—and our concern for the safety of British citizens. Both are of great and equal importance, and where there is any change in security arrangements in relation to our staff, we should make those public unless there are good intelligence reasons for not doing so. The public can then judge us not only on the advice that we give them but on what we are doing for the security of our own staff.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): The Foreign Secretary will know that his Department has issued a serious threat warning in respect of Bahrain, where the grand prix is being held this weekend. Many British citizens will have to attend that event, not as tourists but as employees of the successful British motor racing teams. They will naturally be concerned about the implications of the threat for their domestic insurance policies, such as those related to their mortgages. As well as looking at travel insurance, will the Foreign Secretary work with the insurance industry to ensure that there is clear advice to British workers on the relationship between threat warnings and any exclusions from their normal domestic insurance policies?

Mr. Straw: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, and my answer is yes.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): I warmly congratulate the Foreign Secretary on his statement, not least because of the welcome apparent change of emphasis whereby only very serious threats will now be highlighted to travellers. Can he further confirm that it is in no one's interests for there to be too much, often unnecessary, information given? That leads people to become blasé and take absolutely no notice of the advice on his Department's website.

Mr. Straw: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his comments. When we receive information about terrorist threats, we will continue to describe that information in synopsis form, and say what we have received, as at present. The change proposed is that we will far less frequently say that we therefore advise against all but essential travel. It is in that respect that the currency has been devalued. People are blasé; we had advised against travel to Bali, but I gather that 30,000 British people still chose to go there. We advise against all but essential travel to Saudi Arabia because that is consistent with our current policy, but given that 30,000 of our people live there, what does advising against all but essential travel to Saudi Arabia mean, exactly, for those who live there and have to travel backwards and forwards? That advice is consistent with current arrangements, but it is the House's feeling that it is time those were changed, not least so that the value of the currency can be improved.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Although this is not at the heart of the statement, I welcome the Government's setting-up of the new aviation health department. Could the FCO website give more details and advice to long-haul travellers on how they can take precautions to avoid deep vein thrombosis? That could and would save lives—and if a loved one dies, it really does not matter whether it is from terrorism or from DVT.

Mr. Straw: As one who has to take precautions in that department—I shall not specify what—my answer to the hon. Gentleman is yes.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Anyone who has had ministerial responsibility for travel cannot other than support what the Foreign Secretary has said today. One group that he will consult is destination countries. Travel advice is often seen as an issue for bilateral negotiation between destination countries, and they regard travel advice as a form of value judgment on them as countries. Is that not a problem, and can the Foreign Secretary make it clear to every destination country that travel advice is exactly that: advice that is not negotiable as a political bilateral issue, and which is simply designed to advise UK citizens whether, in the Government's judgment, it is safe or otherwise to travel?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The advice is not negotiable, but although advice on the nature of a threat has to be based on our unilateral judgment, our prescriptive warnings not to undertake all but essential travel inevitably also involve a judgment about the state and quality of local law enforcement agencies. It is that factor that embroils us in some rather difficult bilateral arguments. Countries sometimes say, "Hang on, you said 'all but essential travel' for us", and then proceed to question the decision in respect of certain other countries. They say, "We are co-operating with you more than those countries are, so why are we being picked off in this way?" Of course, we are not picking them off, but that is how it is perceived. That is another reason for pulling back from such prescriptive advice, except where it is really needed, and when people will take notice of it.

Business of the House

2.1 pm

The Leader of the House (Mr. Peter Hain): May I remind the House that Tuesday's business statement has been superseded by the House of Lords' acceptance of the will of the House of Commons? I am grateful that common sense has prevailed by 30 votes, and I am particularly grateful to those Labour peers who stood so solidly by the twin principles of House of Commons supremacy and greater voter participation through postal voting.

The business for the week after the Easter recess is as follows:

MONDAY 19 APRIL—Consideration of Lords Amendments to the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill.

TUESDAY 20 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

WEDNESDAY 21 APRIL—Opposition Day (9th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 22 APRIL—A motion to approve a permanent security screen in the Chamber followed by a motion to approve the First Joint Report of the Accommodation and Works Committee and the Administration Committee on visitor facilities: access to Parliament.

FRIDAY 23 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will include:

MONDAY 26 APRIL—Remaining stages of the Justice (Northern Ireland) Bill (Lords).

TUESDAY 27 APRIL—Progress on consideration in Committee of the Finance Bill.

WEDNESDAY 28 APRIL—Conclusion of consideration in Committee of the Finance Bill.

THURSDAY 29 APRIL—If necessary, consideration of Lords amendments, followed by motion to approve a money resolution on the Christmas Day (Trading) Bill followed by Opposition half-Day (7th Allotted Day) (Part 2). There will be a half-day debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

FRIDAY 30 APRIL—Private Member's Bills.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the Leader of the House recall writing the following in his book "Ayes to the Left"? It states:

> "Once a Bill is introduced it becomes almost a test of Government virility to get it through unscathed. This can produce bad legislation."

Of course, the difference today was that the Labour Lords turned up, whereas on previous occasions a third of them did not. Indeed, some 70 Labour peers did not attend on Tuesday. Instead of the Leader of the House recommencing his personal vendetta against the other place, would it not be better if he could actually encourage Labour peers to turn up for business?

Turning to more important matters of business, will the Leader of the House tell us whether he has finally read the Procedure Committee's third report on Sessional Orders, which was printed four months ago?

[Mr. Oliver Heald]

It recommends that the Government take action to remove the long-standing, visually unattractive and noisy demonstration outside the main entrance to the House of Commons, which, as he knows, also has security implications. The matter has been raised with him from all parts of the House, and by Mr. Speaker. Is it not time that something was done about it, and can the Leader of the House give us a progress report?

We were expecting by now draft Bills on mental health, mental incapacity and the criminal defence service. Where are they and why have we yet to have them?

On the Government's attitude to Select Committees and the civil service, does the Leader of the House agree with the following, which is also taken from his book:

"The Executive needs to be made more accountable by enhancing the system of Select Committees, giving them . . . greater access to information"?

Has the Leader of the House read early-day motion 760?

[That this House expresses its concern that select committees are not able to obtain from the Government the documents and witnesses necessary in order to fulfil their role of scrutinizing the Executive; notes the comments of the honourable Member for Thurrock in the debate on the Hutton Report when he said that Lord Mutton had been able to cross-examine John Scarlet in public, but the Foreign Affairs Committee was refused access to him, and that they had been refused the drafts of the September dossier but Lord Hutton published them on the worldwide web; and calls on the Leader of the House to institute a major review into the way in which Government and ministers treat select committees and the provisions of the Osmotherly Rules and the Ministerial Code.]

Is the Leader of the House aware of the privilege inquiry report on the Lord Chancellor, which was published today, and which finds the Lord Chancellor guilty of contempt of Parliament for attempting to punish a civil servant for giving evidence to a Select Committee? What is he going to do about the report's recommendation that the Government take urgent action in respect of Select Committees? Does he agree that the Government are creating something of a climate of fear among civil servants? With that in mind, does he agree, following the resignation of the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, and in the light of the huge problem that we face in managing this country's immigration system, that we need a proper, independent inquiry into what has happened? It is simply not satisfactory to ask a civil servant, even one as good as Ken Sutton, to make judgments on the actions of Ministers to whom he reports.

The Leader of the House will know of today's newspaper reports that the Prime Minister is taking personal control of the immigration service. I recognise that the Government and the Prime Minister will require a little time to formulate plans to deal with the shambles that is our immigration service, but may we have a statement in three weeks time—immediately after we return from the Easter recess—on what the Government are going to do about that mess?

Mr. Hain: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has the audacity to talk about a mess. When we took office in 1997, we inherited from the then Home Secretary—he is now Leader of the Opposition—an absolute shambles in respect of asylum procedures. I remind the House that applications are down by 50 per cent., that we have doubled the number of removals, and that the monthly intake is at its lowest for six years. Eighty per cent. of applications get an initial decision within two months, which compares with an average of 20 months under the Leader of the Opposition when he was Home Secretary. We removed 17,000 failed asylum seekers last year—three times as many as were removed when the Leader of the Opposition was Home Secretary. The shambles that we should be talking about is the asylum shambles that we inherited.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Stretford and Urmston (Beverley Hughes)—I am extremely sad about her recent resignation—was responsible for driving forward the very reforms that are coping with the problem. I see no need for a statement, and as for the Prime Minister's involvement, as he made clear in this morning's press conference, he is of course taking a close personal interest.

The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) was kind enough to give my book of some 10 years ago a plug. I remind him that it was written at the height of a Conservative Government, and that it referred to all the bad legislation passed under Conservative Governments in particular. He seems unwilling now to accept the will even of the House of Lords. He and his Back-Bench colleagues are disappointed that the House of Lords has upheld the supremacy of the House of Commons, and given many millions more people the opportunity to vote through postal voting.

As Lord Carter pointed out in a letter to The Times this morning, if the House of Lords had not acted as it did, there would have been an unprecedented seventh round of ping-pong between the two Houses. He also pointed out, and it is worth quoting:

"Since 1997, 14 Bills have been sent back to the House of Commons more than once. In the 18 years under the Conservatives three Bills were sent back more than once—one every six years under the Conservatives, one every six months under Labour."

I am glad that common sense has prevailed. We are seeing the Conservatives mobilising their votes in the House of Lords to defeat a Labour majority in the House of Commons. In due course, we will address that problem with a Bill to reform the powers and composition of the House of Lords.

The hon. Gentleman quite properly pressed me on Sessional Orders, and I can repeat what I have said on successive Thursdays: we will bring the matter back before the House when we are in a position to report on the action that he seeks, which the Speaker has also sought.

On draft Bills, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would accept—it is incontrovertible—that we have brought more such Bills to the House than was ever done before. That is a practice that I, as Leader of the House, am particularly keen on, because pre-legislative scrutiny results in better legislation. The three Bills that the hon. Gentleman mentioned will be brought forward in due course. The Chairman of the Liaison Committee has personally thanked me for giving advance notice of when the Bills are due to reach the relevant Select Committees, so that they can prepare their work programme.

I was also asked about enhancing the powers of Select Committees. In fact, the Government have enhanced those powers in a variety of ways, providing them with more resources, the Prime Minister making himself accountable to the Liaison Committee and in other respects. As for the Osmotherly rules, to which the hon. Gentleman indirectly referred, we are currently considering them.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Lord Chancellor and gave a very one-sided account of the report from the Standards and Privileges Committee. Let me quote to the House—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will want to hear it—the statement made by the Lord Chancellor earlier today about the Standards and Privileges Committee report. He said:

"I fully accept its findings and I unreservedly apologise".

The hon. Gentleman will recall that I was quick to say that that matter should go before the Committee, which he welcomed. It has reported, and the Lord Chancellor has unreservedly apologised, which I believe the House will welcome.

The hon. Gentleman made a ludicrous suggestion about Ministers spreading fear among civil servants. Let me tell him that in every Department where I have worked I have had very good relationships with some of the finest officials in the country, and I continue to enjoy that privilege. We ask a lot of our civil servants, who help us to meet the challenges that the country faces, including those on illegal migration and asylum seeking. We are driving forward a record of economic success that is unparalleled in this country, and we are investing record amounts in public services. As I said, we ask a lot of our civil servants: far from their being in fear, they enjoy working for a Government who have a grip, who are in charge and who are driving forward those policies.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Over the last 40 years, legislation has been introduced to deal with racism and incitement to race hatred, but is it not time for Parliament to consider seriously how to deal with extremist groups that are totally unrepresentative of the Muslim community who daily preach hatred and violence, whether it be on the streets or in one or two mosques that they have taken over? If we were able to take such action, would it not help the vast majority of Muslims who are deeply embarrassed by those people who, as I say, are in no way representative of the law-abiding Muslim community in our country, which loathes terrorism no less than we do?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a very good point, which will be echoed almost unanimously in the Muslim community, including by its leaders. I was particularly pleased that the secretary-general of the Muslim Council of Britain, Iqbal Sacranie, whom I know and enormously respect, sent a letter to colleagues throughout the country, making it absolutely clear that extremists and fanatics spoke not for the Muslim community but only for themselves. Indeed, he quoted a section from the Koran to show that the extremists were against its edicts and teachings. We greatly welcome such leadership, and we will continue to work with him and his colleagues to deal with the problem.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Reverting to immigration and asylum, will the Leader of the House, on behalf of his Cabinet colleagues, think carefully during the recess about the way in which the system is being reviewed? Frankly, there is a collapse of confidence in the integrity and credibility of the system, which will not be improved by today's events. The right hon. Gentleman should reflect seriously on the need for an independent, rather than internal, inquiry into the process. It should be undertaken separately from the Foreign Office and the Home Office so that the attitudes and actions of Ministers can be properly examined. Clearly, the Sutton inquiry cannot achieve that.

I heard the dignified personal statement made earlier this afternoon, but does the Leader of the House recall that only on Tuesday the Home Secretary asked the House:

"Has the Minister of State done a first-class job? We all know that she has, so the answer to that question is yes, yes, yes. That is why she has our unequivocal backing and will continue to do so."—[Official Report, 30 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 1444.]

On the same day, the Prime Minister's spokesman made the same point. Does the Leader of the House recall that, when Mrs. Thatcher gave her "unassailable" support as Prime Minister to Nigel Lawson, he was gone within days? Should not Ministers be warned that Downing street confidence is a very dangerous curse?

Turning to the report of the Standards and Privileges Committee, which has been published today, will the Leader of the House examine two important questions? First, there are recommendations about the way in which civil servants treat the Select Committees of the House. Paragraph 34 states:

"One thing this inquiry has revealed beyond doubt is the inadequacy of the guidance on parliamentary privilege currently issued by departments, both for use by Non-Departmental Public Bodies, and for internal departmental use."

What action is being taken on that?

We have just heard that the Lord Chancellor personally apologised, and we accept that, but I hope that the Leader of the House will accept that the Committee report says unequivocally:

"We therefore conclude, on the basis of the facts admitted in evidence, that, even in the absence of intent, the issuing of the letter of 11 December"— the letter from the Lord Chancellor—

"and enclosures constituted a contempt."

Does the Leader of the House accept that being in contempt of the House and its Committees is a very serious matter? We need an urgent debate on it.

Mr. Hain: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has puffed himself up in this aggressive way, which is not typical of him. The report also made it clear that there was no intent on the part of the Lord Chancellor, who has unreservedly apologised. I would have thought that that met the requests of the Standards and Privileges Committee. Paragraph 34 of the report states:

"We are glad that the Government appears to have recognised this, and is taking steps to remedy this deficiency."

[Mr. Hain]

In other words, the Committee recognised the fact that the Government had acknowledged the problem and were taking steps to remedy it.

On the asylum and immigration system, I have to say that although the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) is a respected parliamentarian whose work I value, he is getting into very bad company with the Conservatives in seeking to make cheap points about a Minister who has accepted that she unwittingly gave a misleading impression and has acted honourably in resigning. I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that. If I understood him correctly—he will tell me if I am wrong—he said that this afternoon's statement has not improved the position. I would have thought that, in the sense of showing high standards of honesty and integrity in public life, my right hon. Friend's statement has improved the position. As the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, my right hon. Friend acted decisively to cut down the number of asylum applications and doubled the number of removals. I would have thought that that would be welcomed throughout the House, including by the hon. Member for North Cornwall.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Can we have an early debate on the implications of the interpretation of the Data Protection Act 1998 by public bodies, particularly by NHS trusts? My own local trust wrote to me to say that I needed to acquire a consent form from elderly people in hospital or anyone who telephones my office before I could make any representations on their behalf. Is that not an infringement of the rights of Members, and is it not clear that some public bodies are beginning to interpret the Data Protection Act in a way that undermines our right to represent our constituents and their families?

Hon Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hain: I am very glad that my hon. Friend has raised that matter and, given the reaction of Members on both sides of the House, he has clearly touched on a pertinent point. I remind the House that in 2002, on his behalf and on behalf of all Members, the Government amended the Data Protection Act by an order that came into force on 17 December, which removes the Act's restrictions on the disclosure of sensitive data to Members of Parliament and other elected representatives when they are dealing with constituents' cases.

The Department of Health and the health service are in a slightly different position, as information held by hospitals about the health of individuals is likely to be held in confidence and disclosure to a third party is governed by the common law of confidence. However, the crucial point for my hon. Friend is that the Department of Health has issued guidance for NHS organisations, including trusts, that they should accept an MP's word, when an MP clearly states that he or she has the patient's consent. In that case, it seems to me that the hospital or trust involved should have accepted my hon. Friend's word that he had the patient's consent, as that is in line with the guidance issued by the Department of Health, so he should go back to the trust with that reminder.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Can the Leader of the House assure us that the immigration supremo—namely, the Prime Minister, who is taking a close interest in immigration matters—will use the recess to study the impact of the Hillingdon judgment, to which I have referred the Leader of the House on other occasions? Is he aware that reimbursing boroughs such as Hillingdon, which have a port of entry, involves two Departments—the Home Office and the Department for Education and Skills—and that they do not always integrate or co-ordinate their reimbursement programmes and are tardy in bringing them forward? In future, the process should be accepted as a national responsibility, especially with regard to unaccompanied young people, as assistance is given to adults who are over 18 and not only to unaccompanied children. That is a major matter, and the Prime Minister ought to consider it.

Mr. Hain: The Home Secretary and, no doubt, the Prime Minister will have noted the hon. Gentleman's points. I remind him, however, that, in the past year alone, we recruited 4,000 extra staff to deal with the problems of asylum and illegal migration, which compares with planned Conservative cuts in 1997 of 1,200. Furthermore, if the shadow Chancellor's planned cuts of £1 billion were implemented in the Home Office budget, the hon. Gentleman's problems would get much worse and the problems of dealing with asylum and illegal migration would escalate to an uncontrollable extent. We are getting a grip on the issue, but Conservative policies would make that impossible.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): After the recess, will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the Barker report on housing supply? Over the past few years, Britain has experienced not only the highest house price inflation on record but the lowest amount of housebuilding, and the report addresses that. The issues affect everyone in the country, whether they are the cost of buying their own home, which is unaffordable for many people, or the unacceptable level of homelessness. A debate would also give us an opportunity to expose some of the Opposition nimbyism, when they say that they support the Barker report but not in their backyard. There are many reasons for my right hon. Friend to hold such a debate, and it would give Parliament an opportunity to join in the consultation on the Barker review.

Mr. Hain: I very much agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's points. The issue is important, and that is why the Government acted in advance to commission the Barker review, which provides many of the solutions to the problem. I am sure that all Members find, like me, that the problem especially affects first-time buyers who find it extremely difficult to get on to the housing ladder. However, at least they have the confidence of very low mortgage rates and the certainty that, under the economic stability that the Government have locked in, interest rates will remain low. Mortgages will thus remain low and people can plan ahead in security for a future in which they can own their own homes.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Leader of the House failed to answer—I think, inadvertently—the question put by my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House about the Procedure Committee report on Sessional Orders and resolutions. Can he tell us when the Government intend to reply? Similarly, can he give us an answer about the debate on debate procedures, private Members' Bills and the role of the Speaker? Because the Leader of the House and I have a very good relationship, may I ask him to have a word with his diary secretary to find an earlier date than the one he has offered for his appearance before the Procedure Committee in respect of our inquiry into programming? It will be inconvenient to delay the work of the Committee for as long as the right hon. Gentleman wishes to do. Will he be obliging towards me today—the day after my birthday?

Mr. Love: Happy Birthday!

Mr. Hain: Happy birthday, indeed, to an esteemed Back Bencher, to whom I always seek to be obliging. I remind others involved in such decisions that the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) keeps harrying me on Thursdays about reporting to the House on the Procedure Committee inquiry as soon as possible and that they should note that, but I shall respond as soon as I can. I do not complain that the hon. Gentleman keeps bobbing up and down to remind me of that. I cannot talk about my diary across the Floor of the House, but I shall come to the Committee as soon as I can. Obviously, I do not want to detain its deliberations, but I am not aware of the options available to me in what is a busy diary.

May I thank the hon. Gentleman for the Committee's report on the sitting hours questionnaire? It has been extremely valuable and informative in my taking forward decisions that might enjoy consensual support in the House.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on doorstep selling techniques, especially the activities of firms that prey on elderly people by ringing them up and claiming to have connections with the police and local councils, prior to visiting them to sell them expensive and often useless alarm systems? Can we find time to debate how we might protect elderly and vulnerable people from such high-pressure and iniquitous sales techniques, and how we might also encourage the police to ensure that people are given proper security advice, rather than leaving them to the activities of those fly-by-night firms?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend raises a very important matter, and I and the House are grateful to her for bringing it to our urgent attention. The practice is iniquitous, and the police, in particular, will want to take her advice and act with great speed to clamp down on it. I know that the police and the Home Office will study her intervention closely—after Hansard is printed, that is—and I am grateful to her.

Furthermore, it is imperative that we keep up funding for the Home Office, that we keep increasing it—planned increases are in the pipeline—and that we do not cut it by £1 billion as is planned under the alternative Government of the Conservatives.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): May we have a debate to clarify what should constitute a matter for ministerial resignation? If it has become a resignation matter inadvertently to mislead Parliament and the people over the Home Office and immigration, why is it not a resignation matter inadvertently to mislead Parliament and the people over weapons of mass destruction and Iraq?

Mr. Hain: Quite simply because there was no misleading involved on the question of Iraq.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): May I remind my right hon. Friend of the importance of the charity commissioners, who are the custodians of our charities and ensure that charities are accountable? May we have a debate on the matter, owing to the failure of the Charity Commission to take proper responsibility for the Indian senior citizens centre in my constituency and, perhaps even more important, its failure to respond, through the chief charity commissioner, to me as the Member of Parliament? That lapse in standards is not acceptable and the charity commissioners need a bit of a shot up the—

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Elbow?

Tony Lloyd: A shot in the arm.

Mr. Hain: It is no longer April foo''s day so I shall take very much to heart my hon. Friend's point about a shot in the arm. In fact, he makes an important point. The Charity Commission and anybody connected to it must respond to the inquiries of Members of Parliament and to their complaints and protests. The Home Secretary and in due course, I am sure, the Charity Commission will note the points that he made.

Mr. Forth: When will civil servants get statutory protection from Ministers? We recently had the now-departed Minister for Citizenship and Immigration disgracefully dumping on her civil servants. The Lord Chancellor has at least had the grace to apologise, as a result of the Standards and Privileges Committee report, but it leaves the issue unresolved. How long will it take the Government to provide their civil servants with protection?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman was a Minister in a Government who became a byword for incompetence and sleaze. As for the relationship with civil servants, when we came to office they were delighted to find a Government full of vision, full of grip and full of plans, instead of the incompetent Administration who were kicked out in 1997.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): To endorse the point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), will the Leader of the House find time for an inquiry into the quality of management in some of our acute hospitals? Mr. Terence Hope—one of my constituents and a consultant neurosurgeon at the Queen's Medical Centre University Hospital trust in Nottingham—was suspended two weeks ago because of a hotly denied, most trivial incident that related to a privatised restaurant in the complex. He was reinstated a week later, although by then clinics had been cancelled, operations had been postponed and a lot of lives had been jeopardised. Have we really lost the public service ethos to the extent that it would appear? Can we not have a detailed examination of the background to such incidents so that lessons can be learned for the delivery of high quality clinical care in the NHS, not the pursuit of spreadsheet-type management?

Mr. Hain: I suppose that that counts as the crouton affair. If the facts are as reported and as my hon. Friend underlines, it is, frankly, a ludicrous episode and he is right to bring it to the attention of the House. I am sure that Health Ministers will have noted very carefully what he said.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate as soon as possible on the new Labour doctrine of ministerial irresponsibility, under which Ministers deny responsibility for their own Department's actions, plead ignorance, which should be culpable, blame officials, which is despicable, and attempt to silence whistleblowers, which is intolerable? The latest example of that involves the Lord Chancellor, who was found guilty of contempt of the House. An apology is not enough because the Committee's report says that "a subsequent apology is not, however, sufficient to undo the original damage".

We now have a Lord Chancellor who wants to abandon his title but hang on to the perks of his office; we have a Solicitor-General who is in contempt of court but wants to hold on to her office; and we have a Home Secretary who has used his hapless Minister of State as a human shield in order to deny responsibility for the biggest collapse of immigration policy that this country has ever known. When can we have a debate on Ministers taking responsibility for their actions and inactions?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman was a Cabinet Minister in a Government who consistently failed to take responsibility for their own actions and were bedevilled with incompetence and sleaze. I am amazed that he has come here a few hours—[Interruption.] A member of the Cabinet went to prison as a result of that, so I should have thought that he would have a little less aggression in raising such issues—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The Minister is replying to the questions.

Mr. Lilley: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order in the House, by association, to accuse people of dishonour or impropriety?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Sometimes, in the heat of discussion that takes place in the Chamber, such an inference may be taken, but I did not read that into the reply from the Leader of the House.

Mr. Hain: I was making no such accusation about the right hon. Gentleman; I was referring to what he has said. A Minister in our Government has had the integrity to come before the House, accept responsibility for unwittingly giving a misleading impression, and resign—but he gets up and attacks her and says that that somehow indicates a different picture, when we know the Conservative Government's record. He served as a Cabinet Minister in that Government. That was the point that I was making.

No further action was required of the Lord Chancellor in respect of the Standards and Privileges Committee report—a recommendation about which the right hon. Gentleman failed to remind the House—and his unreserved apology draws a line under that matter.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the proliferation of commercial self-storage warehouses across London? Does he understand the relationship between those people who are put into temporary accommodation or made homeless and the fact that their goods and property are then stored at public expense? Is he as outraged as I am by a story that was related to me by a constituent who came to my constituency surgery two weeks ago? She told me that a sofa that she purchased new for less than £800 has been stored at a cost of more than £10,000, at public expense. Does he not believe, as I do, that the spending of public money in that way should be investigated?

Mr. Hain: I must say that my hon. Friend has brought to my attention and to that of the House an episode and a practice of which I had no knowledge. I am sure that the relevant Ministers will want to take extremely close note of what he has said and to take the necessary action—if it is in their power to take such action, given that those commercial self-storage warehouses are presumably private operations. Clearly, public money should not be wasted to the extent that he implies.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): Is the Leader of the House aware of the problems associated with Mayflower—an automotive engineering company—going into administration, which has put at risk the entire British bus building industry? Owing to the dubious nature of Mayflower's management, workers' pensions have been put at risk. Will the Leader of the House please ask his colleagues to introduce proposals to deal with the pensions of employees in that situation and arrange a wider debate on the future of the bus building industry in this country?

Mr. Hain: I did read reports to that effect, and they are very disturbing indeed. There are echoes of the experience that I have had in Wales with the ASW workers who lost their pensions when the company went into liquidation. In fact, they were robbed of their pensions. That is precisely why we plan to pass pensions legislation to give proper protection to workers so that they do not suffer from such scandals in the future.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of whether the Government intend to bring forward the report on the coal health compensation scheme, application for which ended yesterday? In particular, will they consider the matters raised in early-day motion 818 about legal charges?

[That this House expresses its continued concerns about solicitors who charge clients in addition to the costs paid by the Department of Trade and Industry; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to ensure that all solicitors sign an undertaking guaranteeing that they will not levy any charges from the compensation paid to miners, former miners or their families in respect of coal health claims, and that the Department of Trade and Industry does not make any payments to solicitors until such an undertaking has been signed.]

There are suspicions that solicitors have levied extra charges. If the Government consider such matters, will they look at the situation in Scotland? Although the Law Society of Scotland says that there is no double charging in Scotland, we find that there are a number of so-called arrangement companies—one of which is called IDIC and is owned by Mr. and Mrs. Owens—that are putting adverts in the paper. Very elderly people then phone them up, and all they do is pass them on to a solicitor—that seems to me to be collusion—who sends them a form to sign over 10 per cent. of their claim to the arrangement company. I have found a solicitor who does that and I want the Government to look at it very seriously—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going on rather long.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend raises a very serious matter. We have many examples—I have had to look into some in Wales—of claims farmers advertising and getting sometimes vulnerable elderly people or widows to make claims that the claims farmers are unable to handle. The claims are simply posted to a solicitor, and the claims farmers then charge those people. In some cases, they charge thousands of pounds. The Government's compensation scheme, which has been responsible for payments of well over £1 billion—in fact, I think that the figure is nearing £2 billion nationwide—makes it expressly clear that solicitors and other legal costs will be paid for under the scheme and rules out any charges on former miners and sick miners who have lung disease or vibration white finger, or their families. They are not allowed to be charged under the terms of the scheme. That iniquitous practice by claims farmers must end and, indeed, the Government are looking into it.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): In endorsing what the Leader of the House said about the importance of the letter from Iqbal Sacranie to the imams urging respect for law and order and peace and security in this country, may we have a statement soon from the Home Secretary about the future role of the Minister with responsibility for counter-terrorism?

It is not sufficiently appreciated that the Minister with responsibility for counter-terrorism is one and the same as the Minister with responsibility for immigration. Given the difficulties—I put it no higher than that—that attend immigration issues at present, is it not time now for the Government finally to recognise that we need a separate Minister with responsibility for counter-terrorism, as we on the Opposition Benches have argued all along?

Mr. Hain: First, I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's consistent work in fighting racism. I very much agree with him about Iqbal Sacranie. As for counter-terrorism, I know from personal experience that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and his team have that firmly in their sights. Indeed, my right hon. Friend is involved almost daily in counter-terrorism work. That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question. The Cabinet Minister with responsibility for fighting terrorism is on the case on a daily basis and is taking some tough decisions to protect us. I hope that he will have the hon. Gentleman's support when he does that.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the campaign mounted by thousands of my constituents to have a proper St. George's day celebration? I am pleased to say that it has been taken on board, wisely, by council leader Bill Thomas. Does my right hon. Friend think that the House should celebrate St. George? We have an annual St. David's day debate; could we have an annual St. George's day debate? When my right hon. Friend is answering my question, will he take time to condemn proposals to introduce the single transferable vote for the Welsh Assembly?

Mr. Hain: I am happy to say that I disagree with the Richard commission's proposal for a single transferable vote. As my hon. Friend knows, I am a long-standing opponent, as I think he is, of proportional representation. I do not think that that policy will go much further than the Richard commission. That will certainly be the case if I have anything to do with it.

My hon. Friend makes the novel suggestion that there should be St. George's day celebrations. It is an interesting idea. We have a St. David's day debate. I am not aware that we have St. Patrick's day or a St. Andrew's day celebrated or debated in the House. No doubt it is a matter that I shall have to examine closely now that my hon. Friend has raised the issue in such a cordial fashion.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Now that the ping-pong is over, could we have a thoughtful and temperate debate about the role of the House of Lords? The other place is now in the shape the Government want and they have no further proposals to change it. What are peers' responsibilities, in particular, for Bills that are not foreshadowed in the Labour party's manifesto and for ensuring that no Government use their majority to gerrymander the electoral system?

Mr. Hain: I am up for a temperate and thoughtful debate on any issue. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to carry on in that fashion, he will find me a ready partner. The ping-pong has again revealed—I am glad that the House of Lords saw common sense by 30 votes in the end—the need to deal with the powers and procedures of the other place. Its procedures are chaotic and Governments do not have a proper ability to manage business, with the consent of the usual channels. Its powers need to be examined. On this occasion, the House of Lords backed down at the last minute, which was welcome. However, there was consistent defiance of clear votes in this place, principally orchestrated by Conservative peers, who are in a majority over Labour peers, even though Conservative Members are a small minority in this place.

[Mr. Hain]

Far from backing off, we are considering closely future legislation to deal not only with the issue of compensation but with restricting the power of the Lords to defy the will of the Commons. The role of the Lords is to scrutinise and revise—not to veto.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I welcome the fact that my constituents will be able to have an all-postal ballot in June. It will be good for democracy because it will be good for turnout.

I ask my right hon. Friend to arrange a debate on the excellent work that is carried out by the youth service. It provides good facilities and engages in worthwhile activities that often divert young people from less worthwhile activities that can lead to serious antisocial behaviour. As part of that debate, could we contrast the future of the youth service under a Government whose policy is to provide extra funds for local government, which can lead to further improvements in youth service delivery, with another scenario where significant cuts in the budgets of local councils will lead to the closure of youth clubs, the sacking of youth workers and a rise in antisocial behaviour?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend is right that his constituents will have the opportunity, because of the leadership shown by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and his ministerial colleagues, to vote in the comfort of their own homes. As he has said, that is good for democracy because it is good for turnout, whomsoever may benefit from that turnout.

As for the youth service, my hon. Friend is right that local authority budgets under this Government will continue to rise in accordance with the planned increases in spending. If we were to see a £2.5 billion cut in local government budgets, as the plans of the shadow Chancellor foresee, we would have a decimation of services that are provided for the youth of this country, and an increase in antisocial behaviour would follow as a result.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find time for an early debate on the rebuilding of Iraq so that, first, we can congratulate our forces on their professionalism, courage and moderation in the work that they do in that country, and secondly, have regard to the money under the oil-for-food programme and the development fund—which is now well over £3 billion—and ensure that it is released as early as possible so that the Kurds, the Sunnis, the Shi'ites, the Turkamens and the other ethnic groups can use the money to start building hospitals and schools in Iraq?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman brings a voice of common sense to the Chamber on these matters, which I welcome. Our soldiers and others are doing a fantastic job in rebuilding Iraq. As the survey of Iraqis recently showed, that is getting the support of the population in overwhelming numbers. The hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to make his points with even greater eloquence when there is a debate on Wednesday 21 April in Westminster Hall.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will remember that at the time of the referendum for a Welsh Assembly we were told that Wales was run by quangos. To rectify that wrong, we first had to vote for a Welsh Assembly, and then give it the powers to make a bonfire of the quangos. My right hon. Friend will be aware that there are now even more quangos in Wales than there were when the Assembly was first established. They are more powerful today than when the Assembly was first established.

My right hon. Friend will also be aware that yesterday the Richard commission reported its conclusions. Not surprisingly, it merely repeated the words of its master, Rhodri Morgan, and demanded more powers for the Welsh Assembly. Some of us believe that before pushing for more powers, it should use the powers that it already has. Let us have a debate on the report of the Richard commission, please.

Mr. Hain: I would be quite happy to have a debate on the Richard report. As for a bonfire of quangos, my hon. Friend will know that a number of quangos were taken under the auspices of the Assembly, where they could be better held accountable. A number of other non-departmental organisations have been established to carry out new functions, which has been the practice across Britain.

As for the Richard commission's report, I look forward to detailed consultations with my hon. Friend and other Back-Bench colleagues of all parties, with Cabinet colleagues and also with members of the Welsh Assembly Cabinet to ascertain whether there is a basis for moving forward. I do not think that the model that is outlined to its full extent in the Richard commission's report really provides that basis. If there were to be a Scottish Parliament option, there would have to be a referendum. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me on that. I think that the number of Members of Parliament needs to stay the same in Wales. I think also that the electoral system that has been operating for the Welsh Assembly is deeply flawed—a point that was recognised by the Richard commission.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): As a member of the Standards and Privileges Committee, may I put it to the Leader of the House that he has singularly failed to answer questions properly put by my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House and the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) concerning our report, which was published earlier this morning, entitled "Privilege: Protection of a Witness"?

As the Leader of the House quoted partially from paragraph 34, may I complete the quote? We said:

"We urge the Government to treat this as a matter of urgency. The House should be consulted on the terms of any proposed guidance."

May I have assurances that when the Government finally prepare proper guidance on privilege, not just to Ministers but to all public servants, we will be consulted and there will be a full debate here in the House?

Mr. Hain: I shall certainly bear the right hon. Gentleman's request in mind. It is a new report, out today, and we will study it carefully. We have welcomed the Committee's conclusion that Ministers had regard only to their policy objective of giving CAFCASS a fresh start as soon as possible, and we fully accept the findings. There is no dubiety about that. We fully accept the findings and the Lord Chancellor has unreservedly apologised.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): May we have an early debate on why, with so much money voted by the House for health, district general hospitals like mine are short of money, short of management freedom and short of capacity to deal with all the demands being placed upon them?

Mr. Hain: I do not know about the individual situation in the right hon. Gentleman's hospital, but I assume that he supports a policy advocated by those on his Front Bench that will result in £2 billion being taken out of—robbed from—the national health service, to go down the road and follow patients—who can probably afford to have private operations anyway—under the Conservatives infamous patients passport scheme. So I cannot see how the predicament that he describes locally will be improved by the Conservatives; indeed, it will be made worse. We are consistently putting in more and more resources, which are locked in for many years to come.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Is the Leader of the House up for a thoughtful and temperate debate on the investigative powers of Select Committees? Of course everyone welcomes the Prime Minister coming before the Liaison Committee twice a year and extra staff for Select Committees, but as the recent experience of the Foreign Affairs Committee demonstrated, it is almost impossible to get Ministers to answer questions that they do not want to answer or to provide information that they do not want to give. It is almost a quarter of a century since departmental Select Committees came into being. Would not this be a good time for the Leader of the House and the Liaison Committee to have a discussion about how the investigative ability of departmental Select Committees could be improved?

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Get decent questions.

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend reminds us that we need decent questions. The hon. Gentleman's point is a fair one, and of course I am up for a thoughtful exchange with him and fellow Select Committee Chairs about the powers of investigation and accountability of Select Committees.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Act:

European Parliamentary and Local Elections (Pilots) Act 2004

Point of Order

2.53 pm

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice on a matter that is causing me some problems as a Member of Parliament. Over the past 11 years, when I have written to the chief executive of my local council I have had a reply from her or the chief officer. Since the Scottish nationalist party gained minority control of the council, Mr. David Alexander, the SNP council leader, has been replying to my letters—he has done so on three occasions. I have tried to persuade him that that is not his role. I can find nothing in the council minutes to say that he has that authority. I seek your advice on how I can deal with the matter. Surely it is breach of privilege that he intercepts my letters or deals with them and does not let the council take its proper course or let the chief executive reply.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but it is not a matter that the Chair of the House can deal with; it is a matter for the local authority concerned.

Easter Adjournment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

2.54 pm

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): It is a pleasure to address the House with you in the Chair, Madam Deputy Speaker, as some of the matters that I shall raise relate to an area that you know well in north-east Wales, as you come from the constituency next door to mine. In a week in which there has been some discussion of the report from Lord Richard—known commonly as the Richard commission report—I shall take the opportunity to raise matters that are of concern not just in Wales, but in the House about the responsibilities of Members of the House and the way in which the United Kingdom is governed.

Devolution has had a huge and, in my view, beneficial effect on Wales. As a native of north-east England, when I first moved to Wrexham way back in 1986, it was difficult at times to know that one was in Wales. I moved just across the border seven years later—

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): My hon. Friend says that the Welsh Assembly and devolution have had a beneficial effect on Wales. Does he believe that that applies to the health service in Wales?

Ian Lucas: There are problems in the health service in Wales, which are familiar. They are deep-seated and reflect the poorer state of health of people in Wales, which is of long-standing. The problems in the health service in Wales predate devolution. The structures for dealing with the problems of the health service in Wales differ from the structures in England. One of the benefits of devolution is that we have different systems operating in England and Wales, but where there are examples of better systems working more successfully in England, we must not be afraid of copying them in Wales.

I wanted to reflect on the changes that devolution has made in Wales. There was a surge in the national identity of Wales following the introduction of devolution—an expression of identity that added hugely to the positive feel in the country. It has influenced my views on regional devolution in England. I am from north-east England, which has a strong regional identity that would be greatly complemented by the introduction of a regional assembly. I hope that it will be one of the first areas to have its own assembly following the vote later this year.

Devolution has brought material benefits. It has corresponded with a huge decline in unemployment in my constituency, which is well under 3 per cent. now, compared with a high of 20 per cent. way back in 1983. Unemployment in my constituency has halved since 1997. Devolution and the work of organisations such as the Welsh Development Agency in promoting Wales are an effective way of bringing investment to Wales. I recall an advertisement that I saw on a British Airways flight recently that promoted Wales as a good place for investment and the identity of Wales. That was reflected in my constituency by Sharp Manufacturing announcing only last year that its European base for the production of photovoltaic cells for the European market was to be in Wrexham, in competition with possible sites in Spain, Germany and France. Material benefits have resulted from devolution.

One complication that may be peculiar to my area, the north-east of Wales, is the effect of devolution on the delivery of public services to my constituents. That is the topic on which I shall concentrate. Wales has distinct regions, one of which is north-east Wales, which has a peculiarly close connection with north-west England. The example that I often cite is the Welsh edition of the Daily Post, which is read throughout north Wales and whose back pages carry news about Liverpool, Everton and Manchester United, matters of some interest to my constituents. Meanwhile, The Western Mail, which describes itself as the national newspaper for Wales but is rarely read in my constituency other than by politicians, concentrates on rugby on its back pages, which is of less interest in my constituency than perhaps it is in south Wales. That reflects the different perspectives of my constituents.

Service delivery in my area perhaps reflects the close links between north-east Wales and north-west England. Telephone exchanges in England serve my constituents in Wrexham, some of my constituents attend school in England and many students from my area attend universities throughout the United Kingdom. Many of the specialist medical services that are delivered to my constituents are delivered from England and include vital services such as children's services, cancer services and orthopaedic services. Doctors who work in my constituency are commonly employed on joint contracts with hospitals in England.

I raise these issues in this House and with Ministers from the National Assembly for Wales, but the complications that can be caused by that situation are not always fully appreciated. As a result of devolution, some of my constituents sit in a hospital waiting room next to patients from England to see the same doctor for the same condition, but are told that they must wait longer for treatment than if they were from England. It is equally true that I pay less for prescriptions than my colleagues from England and that patients from Wales will pay nothing for prescriptions by 2007.

The Government do not fully appreciate the position on the ground, and that was certainly reflected by my experience of the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Act 2003, which introduced foundation hospitals in England, while the National Assembly for Wales decided that it did not wish to introduce them in Wales. But it was not fully appreciated at the time in either London or Cardiff that one English hospital, the Countess of Chester hospital, which was in the first wave of hospitals to apply for foundation trust status, which it has since secured, serves not only patients in Cheshire and across north-west England, but my constituents in Wrexham and Flintshire. As patients are entitled to be represented on the board of foundation hospitals, one would expect patients from Wrexham and Flintshire to be so represented, but the Bill, as originally drafted, allowed only patients from England to be represented.

That was clearly wrong, so I worked with my hon. Friends the Members for Alyn and Deeside (Mark Tami) and for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) to secure an amendment to the Bill to allow patients from Wales to be represented on the board of foundation hospitals. To their credit, the Westminster Government and the Welsh Assembly Government in Cardiff agreed to the amendment and the Act now protects the interests of patients from Wales.

That example is important because it reflects the role of MPs from Wales in this House, but it also shows that neither the Welsh Assembly nor Westminster fully understood how services were being delivered in north-east Wales. For Westminster and for Cardiff, England and Wales were entirely distinct and could be dealt with entirely separately, but that is not the reality.

In my pragmatic view, politics is about dealing with reality. In that case, neither Government understood that health services in north-east Wales are delivered from England and Wales and cannot be disentangled, and that is true of England and Wales generally. They are distinct countries, but irrevocably linked.

The strength of the current devolution settlement is that it reflects that reality. Devolution works best when it reflects the position on the ground, and it works worst when it seeks to foster difference for its own sake. Only yesterday, in the debate on the Higher Education Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) raised the effect of that Bill on Wales. There are still substantial difficulties in the way in which the Bill will affect higher education for my constituents.

In my constituency, the North East Wales institute of higher education, an excellent institution that works hard to attract students from poorer backgrounds, takes around 60 per cent. of its students from Wales and 40 per cent. from England. From 2006, when the Bill becomes law, that institution will not be able to charge students top-up fees, unlike higher education institutions in England. The result will be twofold. First, it will be necessary for the National Assembly to make up the shortfall in income for the cohort of students commencing in 2006 for, I believe, a full three years. Secondly, it will be much cheaper for English students to study in Wales than in England because they will not pay top-up fees in Wales. As in the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Act, that policy is not a real and practical one reflecting the long-established and important freedom of students to study wherever they wish in the UK.

Because I want the devolution settlement to work, I want the Assembly in Cardiff and the Westminster Parliament to work closer together. There needs to be input from Westminster because policy in Wales is affected by what happens in England. The Higher Education Bill is a classic example of that. But there also needs to be input from Cardiff bay, because education policy needs to be integrated into the more general thrust of policy in Wales. There are very different developments in education in the secondary sector in Wales, including the Welsh baccalaureate, which reflect the different make-up and needs of the Welsh economy and some of the past deficiencies of secondary education in Wales.

In an effort to try to develop that integration further, for the past two years I have been suggesting that Westminster Members of Parliament and Assembly Members need to work together on joint committees to consider draft legislation that affects Wales. I welcome the views of the Welsh Affairs Committee on the matter, and the work that it has already done to take the proposal forward. I understand that the Presiding Officer in the National Assembly is considering the next stage.

If the Higher Education Bill and the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Act had been considered at an early stage in draft by such a joint committee, some of the problems that still exist in the legislation would have been avoided. I spoke in a debate a few weeks ago on the benefits of draft legislation, to which my good hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House responded, and those benefits are especially evident in helping the devolution settlement to work better. The current settlement works very well between the Executive in Wales, the Welsh Assembly Government, and the Executive here, the office of the Secretary of State for Wales, but it should be improved by developing better relations between Assembly Members and Back-Bench Members of Parliament.

The further separation of England and Wales would not help the operation of the devolution settlement, but it would hinder the delivery of services, choice and efficiency. The strongest argument for giving primary legislative powers to the Assembly would be if the Assembly wanted to do a particular thing, but could not do it without them. I still await an explanation of the particular policy that the Assembly wishes to deliver but cannot because of the current settlement. I am also yet to hear an example of a service that the National Assembly fails to deliver well because of Westminster's input. On the contrary, services are delivered better when the working relationship between Westminster and Cardiff bay is close.

Some say that the current constitutional settlement uniquely disadvantages Wales, but I see no evidence for that. It provides huge benefits for Wales, promotes Wales in a way in which it has never been promoted before and enables policy to be devised and implemented much closer to the people of Wales. The Assembly can therefore be much more responsive than Westminster, but the current settlement also reflects Wales's close links to England, which allows services to be delivered efficiently. I therefore conclude that Wales is uniquely placed within the UK, and that that is to its advantage.

One of the most difficult relationships to manage in any non-unitary state is that between central Government and nations or regions. It can lead to paralysis in Government—in Germany and Spain, for example, there is frustration that the Government cannot bring about change because of inertia. In contrast, the settlement under the Government of Wales Act 1998 is remarkably flexible. I asked the Secretary of State for Wales which functions have been transferred to the National Assembly since 1998, and his written answer states:

> "The functions are too numerous to list".—[Official Report, 15 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 825W.]

Where it has been shown that functions are delivered better if they are devolved, there has been no difficulty in transferring them.

It is time to end the lazy thinking on the Assembly's powers. If there is a case for the transfer of further powers, let it be argued. If there is a case for the

[Ian Lucas]

Assembly having primary legislative power, let us hear a positive argument saying why it should happen and what the advantages would be for the people of Wales and Wrexham. Let those who suggest that it would be better for the people of Wrexham if further separation between England and Wales took place put their case openly. Let us not have the lazy argument that the Assembly should have primary legislative powers because the Scottish Parliament and the Northern Ireland Assembly have them. Those institutions are in entirely different positions, and have different legal systems and separate statute books. A system appropriate to Scotland may not be appropriate to Wales.

If it is said that the current settlement is failing and needs to be changed, let the people of Wales be asked about the matter. The White Paper, "The Government's Proposals for a Welsh Assembly", which was published in 1997, clearly states:

"Wales will remain an integral part of the United Kingdom. Wales and England will continue to share a common legal system and Parliament will continue to pass new legislation for Wales."

The 1997 referendum granted that mandate, and if new laws for Wales are no longer to be made by Parliament, the people of Wales must be consulted in a referendum.

Devolution is a success story, and it can be made more successful by Cardiff bay and Westminster working more closely together. What threatens its success is the desire of some to separate that which is joined and to do so without the consent of the people of Wales. If devolution is to retain the confidence of the people of Wales, such a situation must be avoided at all costs.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I sympathise with the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) in that I, too, represent border country—in my case, the border is between Celtic Cornwall and England, and I agree that problems arise.

This afternoon, I want to raise issues that will concern all hon. Members, rather than raising parochial issues. For some years now, as a member of the Royal British Legion Gulf war group, I have raised concerns on behalf of service families in a series of debates in this House. A number of my immediate family have been regulars in the armed forces, but I must say that I have only recently become aware of the extraordinary disparity between, on the one hand, the commitment of those who serve us, and their families, and, on the other, the often complacent and cavalier attitude of the Ministry of Defence, which has been particularly apparent since the Gulf war of 1991. The continuing serious health problems suffered by so many veterans of that conflict are still a matter of concern, and all too often the Ministry's attitude seems to have carried over into the treatment of those who have served in Iraq in the past 12 months.

We saw another example of that just a few days ago, when a research report identifying a much higher than average number of birth defects and stillborn babies among those service families was published. The Ministry rushed out a denial of the connection even before the actual results had been reported to Parliament—methinks it does protest too much.

My main concern, however, is for the families who lost loved ones in the most recent conflict. Just 12 months after the first casualties in the Iraq invasion, there are still far too many unanswered questions. In the Christmas recess debate, I set out the full detail of the extraordinary and deplorable way in which the tragic death of Sergeant Steven Roberts, from Wadebridge in my constituency, has been investigated.

Sergeant Steven Roberts was the first British fatality in Iraq, on 25 March 2003. At the time of the Christmas recess debate, nearly nine months after he was killed, his widow and family had received hardly any official and authenticated information about the circumstances. However, drawing together the threads, I was able to make these points in that debate: first, Sergeant Roberts had been issued with enhanced combat body armour—so-called ECBA—but it had been taken away from him; secondly, had he still been wearing ECBA, his life would have been saved; thirdly, according to the National Audit Office report on equipment supply failures, 200,000 items of ECBA "disappeared" between 1999 and 2003, resulting in shortages in theatre in Iraq; fourthly, in his confrontation with Iraqi dissidents, Sergeant Roberts' pistol seems to have misfired, but it was reissued and not checked after his death; finally, Sergeant Roberts's family had been given the clear impression immediately after his loss that the fatal shot was fired by a colleague seeking to defend him in a case of "friendly fire", which is an artificial and unhelpful phrase.

We all know only too well that terrible mistakes can occur in the confusion of war. Troops know that they risk injury and even death in any hostilities, but that is not the issue. What is in question is whether the Ministry fulfils even its most basic responsibilities to those who serve their country in the armed forces and their families—months of inadequate information, inadequately communicated, is a pathetic response to that self-sacrifice.

At the close of the Christmas recess debate, the Minister, who is present today, assured me that those concerns would be drawn to the attention of the Secretary of State for Defence, who would meet me, Mrs. Samantha Roberts and other members of Steven Roberts's family. That meeting took place on 19 January, and the Secretary of State retreated from his previous assurances about equipment supply. The House will recall that on 14 May 2003 he told the Defence Committee that there was no evidence of serious shortages:

"There may have been the odd person who did not get the right sized pair of boots. There may have been the odd soldier who one day did not get his lunchtime ration pack. There may have been the odd soldier who did not like his ready-to-eat meal . . . There was sufficient clothing and protective equipment in theatre to deal with a force of this size."

Only five weeks later, Major-General Robin Brims, the UK land component commander, told the same Committee:

"I was aware that we did not have the body armour—we did not think we had the body armour—where we wanted it, in all cases, so we did a major redistribution and it is very hard to do a major redistribution . . . while actually conducting an operation."

At our meeting in January with the Secretary of State, I asked him to explain that extraordinary discrepancy in the evidence given to the Committee, but answer came there none. This is not a trivial issue, as I am sure hon. Members recognise. In the case of Sergeant Roberts, it was literally a matter of life and death. It was at that point in our meeting that Samantha Roberts asked the Secretary of State who carried the responsibility for these failures—if it was not the Secretary of State, who was it? Again, answer came there none. I talked to Mrs. Roberts again this week. Apart from being asked to contribute to a review of contact practices by the MOD's personnel services unit in circumstances of bereavement, she has had no further information, or even an approach from the Ministry.

If that was an isolated example—a one-off—it might be considered very regrettable, but a tragic exception that proved an otherwise impeccable rule. Unfortunately, however, my contact with other bereaved families suggests that the pattern is all too often the same. There is initial support from the immediate team in the unit concerned—that is very good—followed by limited information, which is often misleading and always incomplete, from the Ministry of Defence, then months of total silence, or sketchy details from apparently unofficial sources which cause more confusion than certainty. When at last results of a sort emerge from the official investigation, they appear piecemeal and without any conclusive MOD verdict.

After a full 12 months, many of these families are still in the dark about what caused the loss of their loved ones and whether lessons from mistakes have been learned for the future. That would seem to be precisely the case with the families of the Sea King helicopter crews—based at RNAS Culdrose in my county of Cornwall—who died in a collision during a night flight on 22 March 2003, at the very outbreak of hostilities. For many months, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) and I have been trying to establish the facts of that tragedy on behalf of those families. Last June, the original preliminary conclusions from a board of inquiry told the relatives that the cause of the crash was "indeterminable". That report, which I have been shown by the families, concludes that "there is insufficient evidence to determine positively the cause of the accident."

There was certainly no criticism of the crews or any suggestion of pilot error. Indeed, it was implied that the problem might well have been the absence of night vision facilities, or the detailed advice that was available from air traffic control. The recommendations included the following:

"consideration should be given to fitting all embarked aircraft with a night vision capability."

After months of ineffective contact, with families pressing unsuccessfully for more details of the investigation, the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence, the right hon. Member for East Kilbride (Mr. Ingram), told me:

"Both aircraft had reported visual contact with each other, but apparently lost situational awareness and collided. The aircraft were responsible for their own safety at the time of the collision."—[Official Report, 29 January 2004; Vol. 417, c. 505W.]

To the parents of those brave young men, that sounded all too like an attempt to shift the blame onto the pilots.

The Minister has since amplified his explanation, but the families remain understandably frustrated by the lack of a full and final conclusion to the investigation. Only last week, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives received some answers to his questions—12 months after the event—but the exact significance of the absence of night vision goggles remains a mystery. It would seem that it is another example of equipment failure. When he asked to be given a demonstration of their potential value, his request was refused. As in the case of the Roberts family, 12 months is far too long to take to get at the truth. Presumably, the memories of witnesses are beginning to fade and the trail is going cold.

Yet another example—again via my west country connection—is that of Marine Christopher Maddison, who was based at Plymouth, and whose tragic and unnecessary death on 30 March 2003 I first drew to the attention of the House in a debate many months ago. Long after he was killed, his family became aware that the circumstances were not as the Ministry had originally informed them. However, it took a BBC documentary to expose the facts. A leaked report from the official inquiry revealed that Marine Maddison was the victim of a commando operation plagued by—I quote from its report—

"bad planning, unreliable communications, inadequate equipment and poor leadership."

So it is another case involving inadequate equipment. What is more, it seems that he was yet another victim of a terrible and avoidable accident—he was killed by so-called friendly fire. That leaked report spared no sensitivities in its criticism of the original investigation. It states:

"It is the Board's view that professional inadequacies, factual errors, a lack of rigorous investigation of the facts available at the time . . . were the prime causes of the production of an inaccurate set of findings."

The House may find it difficult to believe, but the Ministry has yet to release all that material to Christopher Maddison's mother. On the sad anniversary of his death earlier this week, I heard her express understandable outrage at the way in which she has been treated by the Government who sent her son to his death in Iraq.

I have cited just three examples that are known to me personally because of my west country connections. Judging from my postbag, other service families—no doubt in the constituencies of Members here today—feel equally hurt, frustrated, or even angry at the way in which they have been treated. Whatever other lessons the Ministry of Defence is learning from its recent experience of the operations in Iraq, I hope and pray that Ministers are determined to improve the way in which they treat the relatives of those who are injured or even lose their lives on our behalf and on behalf of their country.

I have some simple questions. Why do such investigations take 12 months or more? Why are families not given more regular progress reports? Why is information so often slipped out piecemeal, with no official, let alone ministerial, overview? How can the initial investigation be so inaccurate and the eventual board of inquiry so secretive? Is it not time that a high-powered unit within the MOD, directly responsible to the Secretary of State, took responsibility for regular and effective liaison with such families? Given that in so many cases the lack of appropriate equipment seems to have been a major factor, who takes responsibility for that, who takes the blame, and who is making sure that such problems do not recur?

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

All the service families with whom I have been in contact over the past year share one overriding concern—they want to be sure that their loved ones did not die in vain and that the Ministry that sent them to war will do everything in its power to avoid similar mistakes in future. I hope that all hon. Members agree that that is not an unreasonable expectation.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): I shall be fairly brief and raise what the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) might describe as a parochial issue: the Richard commission to examine the powers of, and electoral arrangements for, the National Assembly for Wales. In case some hon. Members are not aware of the fact, I should point out that the Richard commission was not elected. It was not accountable and, indeed, could not be removed.

I gave evidence to the commission, and it was fairly obvious that it was not only undemocratic, but incompetent. I provided it with a written submission, which I read out to it. Lord Richard then informed me that the commission would be unable to cross-examine me because it did not have prior information about what I was going to say. I found that amazing, because Members of this House cross-examine Ministers daily; Assembly Members in Cardiff cross-examine Ministers daily; and, indeed, members of my local authority cross-examine executive members of the council daily. It seems as if Lord Richard did not have the ability to carry out the act that each of us does just about every day of the year.

It was obvious from the day that the Richard commission was set up that its conclusions would merely reflect "his master's voice"—"his master" being Rhodri Morgan. I raised that matter when I addressed the commission. When I said that I could anticipate its conclusions, Lord Richard was not too happy. I said, "Well, you were appointed by Rhodri Morgan, so you reflect the views of Rhodri Morgan." He intervened quickly to say that Rhodri Morgan did not appoint the commission's members. I posed the question, "Who appointed you?" He replied, "Rhodri Morgan", to which I replied, "End of the argument." Lord Richard did not appoint all the members of the commission, because Rhodri Morgan was also involved.

When I read the Richard commission's recommendations yesterday, I was not at all surprised. As I had anticipated, its proposals reflected "his master's voice". Although I was not surprised, I thought, "What a cheek these people have got." Some of us remember, and were involved in, the campaign on whether we should have a National Assembly for Wales. I argued that we should not; I said that having such an Assembly would eventually lead to the break-up of the United Kingdom, but I was told that I was talking nonsense and scaremongering. We were told that the creation of the National Assembly for Wales—or Welsh Assembly, as it is more popularly known—was necessary because Wales had become a quango state and that, increasingly, all the most important decisions were taken by quangos. We were told that the way to rectify that wrong was to create the National Assembly for Wales and to give it the power to prompt a bonfire of all those quangos.

I have studied that matter in detail, and I published a pamphlet on it a short time ago. We find that there are now more quangos than when the Assembly was established; that there are more than when the referendum took place; and that they are more powerful and have even greater influence on the politics of Wales today than when they were criticised several years ago. The bonfire of the quangos has not happened; the process has been a damp squib, because there are more quangos than before. The Assembly was supposed not only to get rid of the quangos, but to democratise Wales. The powers in the hands of the quangos were to be transferred either to a democratically elected Welsh Assembly or to local authorities. As yet, we have seen neither a bonfire of the quangos nor the democratisation of Wales. If the Assembly has not used its powers to make a bonfire of the quangos, which the electorate marginally gave it some years ago, why should we agree—this demonstrates the cheek of the Richard commission—to the demand for even more powers?

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) made the point that some people in Wales say, "We've got to have powers identical to those of the Scottish Parliament", but I have never understood that argument. I have always been in favour of devolution, but opposed to the creation of the Welsh Assembly. I often heard the argument that we are different in Wales and that that explained why we needed an institution that was different from that in Scotland. At least that was a good argument, but we have reverted to merely copying Scotland.

Decisions should be made at the most appropriate level. For example, some decisions might best be made by local authorities or the Welsh Assembly, but decision making about health in Wales is not a classic example of a subject that requires more devolution from Westminster to Cardiff—the opposite. National health service powers should revert to Westminster, because the way in which they have been used in Wales since the establishment of the Welsh Assembly is unacceptable.

I have great regard for my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham and I agreed with 90 per cent. of his speech, but I do not agree with his point that unemployment rates now, compared with those in 1997, are an example of the Welsh Assembly's success. I do not believe that a decrease in unemployment in Wales is a result of the Welsh Assembly's contribution. If that were so, one would not expect a similar decrease in other parts of the United Kingdom, yet dramatic decreases have occurred elsewhere. Not too many years ago, I participated in demonstrations and campaigns against the fact that 3 million people were on the dole.

We are going down the slippery slope. When we held the referendum, I said, "Take it from me, before Assembly Members have the opportunity to put their bums on their seats, they will be demanding a Parliament." I was told that that was scaremongering. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and before their bums hit the seats in the Assembly building in Cardiff bay, they demanded a Parliament. If we agreed to a Parliament, they would demand even more powers. One day, we would wake up and find that Wales was separate from the rest of the United Kingdom—the nationalist dream become reality.

We were told that a Welsh Assembly would revolutionise Wales, but no reasons for that were given. It was said that the mere existence of an Assembly would be enough to bring about a revolution. In the months ahead, different parts of the Labour movement—and, I am sure, Parliament—will debate the Richard report. I was one of those whom a then Cabinet member threatened to kick out of the Labour party if I campaigned against a Welsh Assembly. I say in advance, in case history repeats itself, that if the creation of a Parliament is in our manifesto for the next general election, I shall campaign against it.

The Richard commission recommends that we should increase the number of Assembly Members from 60 to 80. Before the Assembly was set up, Parliament was responsible for all primary and secondary legislation and there were 40 Members of Parliament in Wales. The Welsh Assembly was created with 60 Members, simply to examine secondary legislation, but it is not satisfied. Should it have primary legislative powers, it wants 80 Members, even though it would not have the work load or responsibility of this Parliament.

An additional 20 Assembly Members might not go down too well with the taxpayers, but we are told not to worry because they would cost only another £10 million. Before the referendum, we were told by the yes campaign that a Welsh assembly would cost £20 million, which would be more than enough to run it, and that it would be funded through a bonfire of the quangos. Following the appointment of hundreds of additional civil servants, the cost of running the Assembly is in fact hundreds of millions of pounds.

Another recommendation arising from the Richard commission involves the possibility of a referendum. I am totally opposed to the proposals, as I have said, but if they should go through this House and become a reality, I would participate in the referendum campaign. The question asked should concentrate not only on whether we should give the Welsh Assembly more powers, but on whether we wish to scrap that institution. That would be a far more balanced referendum. I hope that I shall not have to participate in any such referendum, because I hope that my party will have the good sense not to go down the separatist road. If it does, I shall participate in the referendum campaign, as I did in the previous one.

Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey) (Con): I very much appreciate having the opportunity to draw to the House's attention five important issues for my constituents.

The first, following the comments of the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) relates not to legislation but to the implications and delivery that follow on from legislation. Yesterday, Michael Varah, who had been the chief probation officer for Surrey, left the probation service before time, and I hope that the Home Secretary will look into the reasons for his departure. Surrey is an area where it is difficult to find public servants, yet it has exceeded others in its delivery of probation services. It is the third highest performer out of the 42 probation services, and has achieved the highest score on the European excellence model, and the highest level of sentencer satisfaction in the south-east. Its Investors in People award has been renewed, and it is the top-performing area out of 42 in terms of efficient use of space and its accredited programme completions. It also has the highest staff job satisfaction in the south-east, which is a remarkable outcome, and it was the first to achieve the citizens charter award. Michael Varah is leaving his post early, and all that I ask of the Home Secretary is to ensure that Mr. Varah's views on the National Offender Management Service are properly considered. The legislation has gone through, and it will be two months before the new service begins its work. The comments of a public servant such as Michael Varah, who is dedicated to the general good, would be very useful indeed.

My second subject is Farnham castle, of which I am president. It is a wonderful 12th century castle dedicated to intercultural briefing. For years, it was dedicated to training British expats going overseas to work in different parts of the world. It has reinvented its mission and is now involved in briefing people coming to this country. My connection is with Sir Bernard Crick's work, "The New and the Old", the report of the Life in the United Kingdom advisory group. The Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 required that residents seeking British citizenship be tested to show that they had a sufficient knowledge of English, Welsh or Scottish Gaelic, and a sufficient knowledge of life in the United Kingdom. I have been interested in race relations for many decades—perhaps since I was chairman of the juvenile court in Brixton at the time of the Brixton riots—and I believe that the provision of sensitive training and preparation for people coming to live in this country is enormously important. Farnham castle has run four excellent pilot programmes for teachers of English as a second language. However, work on the highly skilled migrant programme and in other areas seems to have come to a grinding halt. There were high expectations for those initiatives, which I believe could make a profound difference. Will the Minister ensure that I receive a reply from the Department for Education and Skills and the Home Office, to tell me what the next steps are to be? The programmes that Farnham castle has run, which Sir Bernard Crick visited, were funded generously by the Esmée Fairburn foundation. There appears to be no funding and no progress, but surely at this time, when race relations are perhaps more important than at any previous time, some practical examples of good practice could be developed.

One thing that I shall miss when I am no longer a Member of Parliament is the diversity of issues that constituents bring to us. Last Friday, students from the Surrey Institute of Art and Design came to my surgery. I imagined that they were going to protest, as students did yesterday, about the Government's appalling steps to ensure that students live in poverty and are discouraged from applying for courses that provide no immediate remuneration. But that was not the case. James Lee and his team from the Surrey Institute of Art and Design came to see me on a subject on which I have never been contacted previously. They wanted me to know that one of the unforeseen consequences of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 may be the loss of up to 50 per cent. of public toilets. The British Toilet

[Virginia Bottomley]

Association, about whose existence I must admit that I was not altogether well briefed, has done excellent work on this matter. Its strong belief is that in too many cases local authorities will close public toilets because it is too costly to make them disabled-accessible. I ask the Minister whether he can bring this matter to the attention of the Minister for Local and Regional Government, and perhaps discussions can take place with the Local Government Association, so that the excellent students at the Surrey Institute of Art and Design, while disappointed at the Government's progress with regard to student fees, can at least feel encouraged on this matter of fundamental importance.

My constituency has an Abbeyfield home at Haslemere, two in Farnham, and a special care Abbeyfield home. There are 800 Abbeyfield homes across the country. Taking over from Dame Gillian Wagner, I have become the national president. Abbeyfield's concern is that lack of progress on the supporting people grant is putting its work in serious jeopardy. I am sure that virtually every Member values the work that Abbeyfield society homes do in their constituencies to provide sheltered accommodation and support to older people, with care, companionship and privacy in a collegiate atmosphere. Volunteers and others are generous with their time and resources. At a time when all too many homes for the elderly are closing because the Government insist on higher standards without being able to make the financial means available, it would be a great shame if such an effective, successful movement were seriously jeopardised. I simply ask that the Deputy Prime Minister's colleague who is most responsible for this issue should meet Brian House, Abbeyfield's chief executive, to discuss why a relatively small modification in the supporting people grant could make all the difference.

I fear that my last and fifth point is of a particularly grave and disappointing nature. The rumour mill in my constituency is turning once again about grave and serious implications from internal NHS decisions, which will force decisions on our local primary care trust that will be entirely unacceptable to local people, and that will entirely breach the growing respect and confidence that they have begun to regain in the NHS. One of the greatest disappointments about Labour when it came to power was that in the first couple of years after 1997, as many as one in 10 of my constituents were waiting more than a year for in-patient treatment, whereas the figure in Durham was only ever one in 100. We had a serious crisis, with more and more people having to go to private sources to ensure that they received adequate health care. I have now received messages again from Milford hospital and Haslemere hospital suggesting that the flexibility that was available will be withdrawn and that several million pounds will be taken out of the budget, or decisions will be taken that will entirely destroy any sense of consensus about the NHS. I hope that the Minister will bring that to the attention of the Secretary of State for Health. Surrey contains many people who pay a high rate of tax. They pay the Chancellor of the Exchequer in good spirit, but they expect a fair return. It is wrong that people on social security in Surrey should receive a much worse standard of health care than people on social security in Bermondsey or Durham. The cost of living and the cost of wages are so great in Surrey that the delivery of public services is particularly difficult there. We have already lost an excellent health authority chief executive—someone like Michael Varah—who was dedicated to the NHS. Six years ago, she was asked to try to deliver the undeliverable. We now have a new team, dedicated and professional, who fear that mounting pressures may prevent them from delivering what is required. We must present our public servants with challenges that are achievable. I hope that the Minister will be able to convey that to the Secretary of State for Health before the Easter break.

I hope that I have spoken within my allotted 10 minutes, which will have pleased my colleagues. I apologise to the Minister for not being able to be present for the winding-up speech. That is a grave discourtesy—but I will read every word with the greatest care as I open my Easter eggs.

3.52 pm

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a few observations about the fragile health of local government. Like many Members—although, I suspect, none who are present now—I have served on the borough council in Southend-on-Sea, and also on the county council. One of the disadvantages of maturing in years is that one's ideas appear to be outdated until they come back into fashion. I await the time when what I am about to say comes back into fashion. When I was elected to the borough council in 1980, I had the privilege of serving on the bus committee because we had a fleet of buses. I had the pleasure of serving on the airport committee because the council had its own airport. I had the pleasure of serving on the amenities committee because we had theatres, piers, bandstands and a range of municipal enterprises run by the local authority. I did not serve on the housing committee; had I done so, I would have been in a position to consider housing policy in the borough, and decide whether to admit people to tenancies.

Over the years, the situation has changed. No one can deny that. The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who is present, knows full well that we no longer have a fleet of buses, an airport or many of the other facilities that were once operated directly by the council. However, I think that the decline in local authorities' ability to influence the lives of those whom they serve has been diminished in an even more important way. One of the pleasures of all councillors was to serve on a planning committee. I say that it was a pleasure, but it was not a pleasure to be contacted by all and sundry about the decision that one was about to make. Whatever decision was made was almost invariably wrong in some people's eyes. Nevertheless, one had the ability to make a decision on what should happen in the community, based on local knowledge and representation. The present doctrine requires one to sit there like a puisne judge and regard the whole thing as a quasi-legal process, staying clear of any electors who might approach one, lest one disqualify oneself from making the decision by listening to them. As a consequence, yet another function of the locally elected councillor has been diminished to the point at which it lacks any democratic vitality.

I do not wish to paraphrase the great former Member Aneurin Bevan, who kept trying to see where the power was as he moved up local government, but I then served on the county council. When I first went there, the county council had a police committee, on which I served. Elected members had a major responsibility for considering not the operational details, but the general direction of the force within their own county. The county council also operated the fire brigade, as it was then known, in the county. Local authorities also ran colleges of higher education. All of those matters have been stripped away from local authorities to the various bodies to which my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) referred in relation to the Principality.

Is it a surprise that fewer people now take an interest in serving on local authorities or in taking part in the election of those few who wish to serve on them? Alas, what I have said is not even the end of the decline. The decline has gone on apace under Governments of both political persuasions. We now have cabinet-style government in local authorities. That was to be the dynamic engine to drive local government into the 21st century, as the cliché has it. There always was a cabinet in local government. The leaders of the controlling party would meet to map out the course it was to take; they would then have the devil of a job steering policies through the committees because their own supporters would wish to promote local matters.

That appears not to be so now. We have cabinets—a grand-sounding name which, to those of us unlikely ever to serve on one, has a certain distance. The cabinets make all sorts of decisions before they are ever discussed by elected representatives, either in the county or the borough. We have scrutiny committees, which ape the mode in this place. As far as I can understand from councillors I know, it is difficult for the scrutiny system to be effective. In any event, the decisions have been made already.

We have novelties such as elected mayors in some places—fortunately, the county of Essex has not been burdened with such an idea—but they have not always turned out as people imagined. The major parties thought that people were bound to elect one of their own, but they have found that a Liberal, a member of the Green party or, in one case, an official monkey might be elected.

I do not know how powerful some of those mayors are. We have heard about the former Member for Brent, East in his position as Mayor of London. The great leaders of the London county council such as Herbert Morrison would have been dismissive of the puny powers of the Mayor. We must consider what the non-mayors who led the county council achieved in the past, not just within the London but way out in the surrounding community. Their monuments are still there to be seen today. It is premature yet to judge whether the Mayor of London will achieve that.

I do not believe that the purpose is to destroy local government. I believe that carelessness has slipped in over the past 20 to 25 years. If we allow that carelessness to continue, we should not be surprised if people are disinclined to take part in elections, however many postal votes we introduce or however many times we change the election date from one day to another. Each change in a way humiliates local government, as the election is tagged along with another election. I hope that the spirit in which I say that alludes not to the errors of judgment of any political party, but to a collective philosophy that we all share. It is perhaps now the time to say, "No more". Let us consider what local accountability and local democracy are really about.

4 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): Before the House adjourns, I should like to raise the case of my constituent Major Richard Perkins, on whose behalf I have been corresponding with Ministers in the Ministry of Defence for more than four years. Major Perkins was discharged from the Army in 1959, following service with the Royal Leicestershire Regiment in Malaysia. In December 1958, a medical board pronounced him

"unfit for any form of military service".

He had suffered a mental breakdown. Although he was unaware of this, his medical condition was judged by the MOD at the time not to be attributable to service—which was to become very important later.

In October 1998, as many colleagues know, the Army personnel centre in Glasgow wrote to several hundred retired Army officers, drawing attention to an error in the tax treatment of the pensions of a number of former Army officers who had retired on health grounds before 31 March 1973. Major Perkins received such a letter, which said:

"Our records suggest that you may be affected by this error."

A review determined that he was not entitled to tax-free status because his illness, according to the records, was not attributable.

The pensions appeal tribunal subsequently overturned that decision, and on 15 August 2001 it ruled that his medical unfitness was "attributable to service" and that he had at the time suffered a "major depressive episode". The Veterans Agency wrote to him immediately to inform him that he was therefore entitled to tax exemption and refunded the tax that he had paid on his pension since the date of his appeal in 1999. The agency, for some inexplicable reason, then undertook an assessment of his disability now. It determined that he had a 0 per cent. disability and that in consequence, he was not entitled to tax exemption after all. Tax deductions have recently been reinstated.

I advised Major Perkins to appeal against that decision, as did the Forces Pension Society. I also wrote to the Armed Forces Minister on 19 December—my most recent letter—asking him to review the case again and pointing out that the ruling of the pensions appeal tribunal could not have been more clear. What is the tribunal for, if its rulings are not to be honoured? At the time of his discharge in 1959, Major Perkins's medical unfitness was attributable to service, and successive tax statutes have confirmed that pensions payable in such circumstances should be exempt from tax. Indeed, the most recent such statute, the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003—yes, it is that recent—specifically states:

"No liability to income tax arises on . . . retired pay of a disabled officer granted on account of medical unfitness attributable to or aggravated by service in the armed forces of the Crown".

I am still awaiting a definitive response from the Armed Forces Minister to my letter of 19 December, although he has confirmed that the matter is being looked into.

[Mr. John Greenway]

In the meantime, completely out of the blue, on 8 January the Veterans Agency advised Major Perkins that it had decided to revise its earlier judgment of 0 per cent. disability to a judgment of 15 to 19 per cent. disability, and granted him the appropriate level of war disablement gratuity. That should put beyond all possible doubt Major Perkins's entitlement to tax exemption, so why the continuing delay? That happened almost three months ago, but nothing has been done to confirm his entitlement to the tax exemption.

By wrongly taxing Major Perkins for more than 40 years on what is an extremely modest pension, the MOD has significantly undermined his quality of life. My constituent is now 86 years old. The Government should surely refund the tax and pay to him without further delay the compensation that they have given to others, while he has the chance to enjoy it.

Major Perkins lives at Lastingham, in the North York Moors national park, and I want to discuss the livestock farmers of that area, who will be critically affected by the Government's proposed reforms to the common agricultural policy. My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) raised this issue in a Westminster Hall debate a couple of weeks ago, and I should like to endorse all that he said about the problems that producers face in what the jargon describes as a "severely disadvantaged area". They face a significantly greater cut in support payments than will apply to lowland producers—to the extent that they will get even less support than lowland farmers. That is not only unjust; it simply does not make sense. The support system has always recognised that upland farmers need additional help because of the difficult climate and landscape conditions under which they farm. They cannot grow quality crops, but access to good grassland in upland areas has enabled them to become the backbone of the beef and sheepmeat industry. Many in this country believe that that industry is the best in Europe, if not the world.

The North York Moors national park committee is concerned that if these farmers are forced out of business—as many will be—the park's environment and landscape will be adversely affected. I am aware that representations are being made to Ministers, and many colleagues have raised their own concerns, but I should be grateful if the Deputy Leader of the House passed on my concerns to his colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and urged them to think again. I will be meeting some of these farmers in Ryedale during the Easter recess. They deserve to be reassured that, at the very least, the Government will re-draw the boundaries applicable to qualification for support payments in such a way that upland and lowland farmers will be treated more equally.

The third issue concerns the town of Pickering, which lies at the foot of the North York moors and suffered severe flooding on no fewer than three occasions in the past three years: in March 1999, in October and November 2000, and in August 2002. Following the October 2000 flood, which colleagues will recall was particularly bad across Yorkshire, DEFRA Ministers agreed in February 2001 to fast-track eight flood defence schemes in the Yorkshire and Humber region. Pickering's is the only scheme that has not been progressed. The reason why is that it is both difficult to engineer and less easy to justify financially, because fewer properties there are affected by flooding than are affected in the more urban areas.

At a recent meeting, the Yorkshire regional flood defence committee, on the advice of the Environment Agency, decided to defer the scheme for further technical appraisal. However, the fast-track status of February 2001 expired yesterday, and even though the new points-scoring system—introduced by DEFRA in association with the Environment Agency—is less onerous than before, the considered view is that Pickering is unlikely ever to qualify for a scheme without the Government recognising that it is a special case and that the normal rules need not apply. Indeed, that is why special status was awarded three years ago. There is widespread disappointment and dismay at the fact that the Minister with responsibility for floods and his Department have declined the flood defence committee's request that special status be extended for a further two years. You will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I presented a petition on this matter only last week, as I think you were in the Chair at the time. To all intents and purposes, the Government promised Pickering a scheme. I hope that the Minister with responsibility for floods will, in time, respond more positively to help us to deliver on that promise to the town's residents and affected businesses.

My final point—I shall be as brief as possible—is about a more national and pressing matter relating to terrorism insurance. I remind the House of my long interest and experience in the industry. Members may recall that, following the IRA bomb at St. Mary Axe in 1993, insurers withdrew from providing insurance cover for property damage caused by terrorism. The all-party insurance and financial services group, which I have chaired since 1992, persuaded the then Government to set up a Government-sponsored insurer—Pool Re, a company which has worked extremely successfully. Following a number of approaches from the insurance industry, Pool Re's remit has recently been extended to cover business interruption, the point being that many businesses cannot trade for long periods if their premises are destroyed by a terrorist bomb.

The Treasury is endeavouring to make that important change without the need for further primary legislation, which is a wholly laudable aim. However, I want to suggest to the Leader of the House that significant difficulties of definition have led to uncertainty within the London insurance market as to the cover provided. The Reinsurance (Acts of Terrorism) Act 1993 was written to deal with the threat posed by the IRA, not by al-Qaeda, so there are problems over the definition of organisations. In 1993 atrocities were caused by terrorist bombs; the atrocity at the World Trade Center in New York was caused by impact. There is also a desperate need to cater for public and employer liability, particularly in the area of bodily injury.

Insurers and their clients need greater certainty than is felt within the market at present. I am aware that there are ongoing discussions with the Government and the industry and I very much hope that the Leader of the House will expedite the matter.

Discussing terrorism on the floor of the House is always difficult, but if the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and Ministers are warning us that a terrorist incident in one of our major cities may be inevitable, the preparations that we make for such an appalling eventuality must surely incorporate being ready for the financial consequences. That problem has to be resolved with real urgency and I hope that what I have said will help to achieve that.

4.12 pm

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): In common with most hon. Members who have spoken in the debate, I shall raise a series of mainly parochial issues. The first is about primary education in my Hornchurch constituency. There is a Conservative-run council in Havering—sadly, because it is both incompetent and bloody-minded. That has been demonstrated over recent weeks and months as it had created a position whereby at least two, possibly three, primary schools feel threatened with closure.

The brief history is that the council initially commissioned a report, according to which, because of surplus places in area that it defined as "Elm Park and South Hornchurch", the R J Mitchell school had to close. The school is named after the designer of the Spitfire because the school is located in what was once RAF Hornchurch, a historical site. A magnificent local campaign was conducted, with which I was involved, and it managed to defeat that proposal. Although school places were somewhat down in that particular school, it had a rising reputation, and I believe that in the next four or five years with house building in the borough and young families moving into the area the school numbers will increase.

The council then decided to set up a working party to reflect and report on the conclusions of the original report. Someone in the administration selectively leaked the findings of the working party, to the effect that two different schools were now under threat—Suttons and Ayloff schools in the same Elm Park and South Hornchurch area. Now, three schools are panicking over possibly facing closure and the council has managed to alienate the maximum number of people that it could. I attended meetings at Suttons, R J Mitchell and Ayloff schools and we had lobbies at the town hall.

If, a few months ago, someone had sat down to think about how to create maximum concern, panic and worry among governors, staff, teachers and children, they could not have produced a better plan. The council has gone as far as it is possible to go to alienate the maximum number of people in that part of my constituency.

Apparently, a decision will be made next week about which school might face closure, but there is no need for any of those schools to close. Suttons school is full and has a very good reputation. Ayloff school has some spare places, but only 14 per cent.—which is well under Government guidelines that stipulate that action should be taken only if the spare places reach 25 per cent. or more. Even then, the guidelines do not mention closure, but only the possibility, among other measures, of reducing capacity.

There is no reason why any of those schools should close. The latest to be threatened—Ayloff and Suttons—have good reputations; they are attractive schools and people actually move into the area so that their children can attend them. The same is true of R J Mitchell. None of them should face closure. I hope that we can win a victory on that campaign, as we did for the R J Mitchell school.

Secondly, I want to raise something that has been discussed many, many times in these debates and on other occasions in the House: mobile phone masts.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): Hear, hear.

John Cryer: The hon. Gentleman is already getting excited—perhaps he will be raising the same issue later.

Two campaigns are under way in my constituency. The first is on O2's proposal to erect a mobile phone mast close to a primary school in an area called St. Leonard's hamlet—the original name for the Shoreditch children's home, mainly for orphans from the east end of London who were moved there in the 1920s, 1930s and later. However, the Stewart report—the most substantive piece of work on mobile phone mast technology—made it clear that, as a preventive measure, such masts should not be sited near primary schools. The skulls of children aged under 12 are less developed than those of adults, so they would be the most affected by any radiation produced by such masts.

I am not thrilled about having such masts anywhere in my constituency, but I realise that millions of people use mobile phones so the masts have to go somewhere. O2 wanted to put the mast next to St. Mary's school. That plan was rejected and the company submitted a proposal to put the mast on top of Harrow Lodge sports centre. Again, the plan was abandoned and it was proposed to erect the mast near St. Leonard's hamlet—much of which, due to its historical significance, is a conservation area. An effective local campaign is resisting that plan and the council has persuaded O2 to go back to the drawing board and reconsider.

O2 is proposing to erect another aerial near two schools on the same site. Their names—the Scargill infants school and the Scargill junior school—will have resonance for many Members. In the light of the Stewart report, and given the defeat of the company's previous attempts to put up aerials near primary schools, the House might have thought that O2 had learned a lesson and would look elsewhere—but no, it is trying to stick another aerial next to a junior and an infants school. Again, there is a local campaign and I hope that those plans can be defeated, as were others in the past.

My third point relates to the docklands light railway. Much of my constituency is in the Thames gateway regeneration area, for which there are great plans. Indeed, some of them have already been put into effect, while others will come to fruition over the next decade or so. However, there is one thing missing for Dagenham and also for Rainham, which is in the south of my constituency next to the Thames: transport links. There is a plan to extend the DLR—perhaps as far as Barking. It should go not only as far Dagenham but also to Rainham, because the transport links to London are inadequate.

The current rail service—c2c, formerly the London, Tilbury and Southend railway—is not sufficient to carry people in and out of the City during the rush hour; even at peak times, there are only three trains an hour. Any transport expert would tell the House that an effective commuter line for London needs at least four, and preferably five or six, trains an hour. Three trains an hour are not enough. The most obvious solution is to extend the DLR, and unless that is done the Thames gateway will not succeed. I have raised that with Transport for London, with the Mayor, Ken Livingstone, and with a number of people in various capacities. There is a possibility that those proposals will come to fruition, but I am raising the issue today to emphasise that we need those transports links.

Lastly, I want to raise the issue of the Richard commission, although I am not a Welsh Member of Parliament—my constituency is in London. The Richard commission has recommended the introduction of the single transferable vote to the Welsh Assembly. What worries me is that if there were any possibility of the Richard commission proposals being accepted, such things could be proposed elsewhere. There are principally three areas—Scotland, Wales and London—where we have a kind of proportional system. A sort of vague, messy, bucket of pigs' entrails system has been introduced in London, Wales and Scotland. It is usually known as the additional member system. No one wanted it, and no one wants it now. It is very unclear, vague and not particularly accountable. Personally, as a matter of principle, I am completely opposed to proportional representation anyway. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Thanks for that.

Some time ago, shortly after the introduction of the Greater London authority, I tabled a question during the pilot period, when the precise definition of the GLA had not been completed, about what representations were made during the consultative period in support of what has become known as the additional member system. The answer that I received was that, out of 1,000 responses on the electoral system to be adopted, nine supported the additional member system, which, cynical as I am, led me to think that the Government would foist a tacky system like that on London, no matter what Londoners actually wanted. That is what we have seen.

If we move further towards a more pure proportional system, such as STV, we will have less effective representation. If we go down the route of increasing proportionality, we lose representation—we lose that constituency link. There is no choice about that. The problem for a lot of people who support proportional representation is that they think that, somewhere, there is a semi-mystical system that will provide perfect representation and a perfect constituency link will be preserved, yet there will also be perfect proportionality. Such a system does not exist.

The first-past-the-post system is obviously not perfect, but no system is perfect. First past the post is the nearest to a perfect system that we have. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] All right, calm down. It preserves direct accountability to the electorate. If we move further towards STV, we will see further alienation from the democratic process and increasing numbers of people failing to vote. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith), I am not exactly clear of the genesis of the Richard commission, but if those ideas start to be adopted, it will be a disaster for representative democracy.

I have always supported the concept of a Greater London authority. The Greater London council should never have been abolished—that was just a Tory plot to try to rig things. The GLC should have been preserved. If we have some sort of Greater London authority, it should be run using the first-past-the-post system, with a single member for each borough. That is the most direct way to do things.

In the past four, five or six years, I have not heard a convincing argument for why we have the absurd system of twinning boroughs and an additional member system that no one wanted in the first place. We should do away with that system, have a single member for each borough and go back to first past the post, so we can re-establish the direct link and democratically accountability.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I shall transport the House from the boroughs of London to beautiful Devon, which is looking particularly good at the moment. The primroses are out in the banks, as are the celandines, and there is a touch of green in the hedges. I hope that many Members will spend their Easter break in my county.

I shall raise some problems in rural Devon. The size of my rural constituency is 600 sq miles. It is made up of small market towns and very small villages. Today, as I was thinking about what I wanted to say about Devon villages, I received a letter from the Countryside Agency advising me that the vital villages programme will close to new applicants. At the heart of this is the fact that the agency has had a reduction of £104.5 million in its settlement. Therefore, it will have to readjust its last published corporate plan.

The purpose of the vital villages programme was to enable villages to plan for their own future and to come together with the community to consider the vital services that all villages need. I fear for the survival of some of my villages where they already have problems with maintaining village halls. We have had much to say about village halls but they are important to a small community. I think particularly of my most northerly parish of Morebath, which is on the Exmoor border. Unfortunately, the village hall became so unsafe that it had to be demolished. The land is still available but the community must save from scratch to build a new hall.

In the south of my constituency, I have an acute problem in a small village called Gittisham, near the town of Honiton. Only a week ago, the occupants of 27 homes, all owned by one landlord, were advised that their tenancies would be terminated. That represents two thirds of the village. The impact on the community speaks for itself. Members should visualise the impact in the context of a town. If two thirds of a town's community were told, "You have three months' notice", that would present a real problem to that town or that community. I am working with all the agencies that are trying to find a solution to that acute problem.

East Devon district council, which constitutes the housing department in that part of Devon, is faced with having to rehouse these people. It already has 3,600 people on the housing list waiting for a home. Families with children will want to remain connected with their local schools. Elderly people will have packages of support from their social services department. I have written to the Minister, Lord Rooker, and I hope that his Department will fast-track an answer to me today so that when I return to Devon for the Easter recess I can meet the community and, if not solve the problem overnight, at least identify some options that might alleviate the acute problem that is faced in this small village.

Every village has the problem of post office closures. In my postbag today, I received a letter from the Payhembury parish council in east Devon, to advise me that it is concerned that it will lose access to its local village petrol pump because of action taken by the Environment Agency, which in following through a small spillage of oil has identified that although that problem has been sorted, the very small petrol station will have to fix some kit to the petrol pumps. The capital investment will be more than the petrol station makes in profit from the pumps. I hope that the Minister, who is smiling, is smiling sympathetically in response to the problem. If Payhembury loses its petrol pumps, motorists will have to make a 15-mile round trip to get petrol.

A small shop is attached to the petrol station. If the pumps go, there is a risk that the village shop will be lost as well. These are the day-to-day problems in villages in glorious Devon.

It seems a most untimely decision to curtail the activities of the Countryside Agency in its support for villages and rural communities that face myriad problems. My message to the Minister on the Treasury Bench, who I know will take up these matters with the appropriate Government Departments, is please to think again about the problems of rural communities.

At the heart of rural communities, of course, is the farming industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) mentioned the impact of the changes to the common agricultural policy and the very difficult problems we will have on the uplands. I am worried about that because the landscape will change—it will go back to nature. That does not mean that it will look more beautiful than it does now. It will look unkempt and wild, so there will be a big environmental impact.

As my hon. Friend rightly pointed out, that is not land on which one can grow crops, but it is suitable for rearing animals. Is it not ironic that at a time when we may not be able to support farming and animal farming on the uplands, we face the prospect, through changes to the rules on animal transportation, that we may end up eating more horses? Perhaps that is the game plan. We will not eat cattle and sheep; we will have to resort to eating horses.

We have been pressing the Government to use their powers to ensure the protection of horses, particularly horses that go abroad and end up in the meat trade, especially in France—a subject I know about, having been responsible at one time for equine health. We are begging the Government to ensure that the long-standing protection of our ponies on Dartmoor and in the New Forest—those low-value horses that we have always protected from being sold off as cheap meat abroad—is maintained in our British law. I urge the Government again today to use that power to ensure that our horses are protected.

I know that hon. Members are concerned about the time, but I shall raise one more issue. I was bitterly disappointed yesterday. I tried not to show it. I tried to be brave about it. After months and months of putting my name in the ballot for a question at Prime Minister's Question Time, I came up in the ballot yesterday, but I was No. 9 and that number was not reached. I must admit that I did not know until yesterday morning that I was in the ballot. I had got so used to not being drawn in the ballot that I had forgotten to look. It is rather like the national lottery—I forget to look to see whether I have won anything. There it was: No. 9, so I spent most of yesterday morning preparing the killer question to the Prime Minister, which I never had the chance to deliver.

I shall deliver the question now to the Minister on the Treasury Bench. It is about why the Prime Minister persists in denying the United Kingdom a referendum on the EU constitution. Within a year after the Government came in, they had had four referendums. Since they have been in office, they have held 34 referendums. So keen were they to move to referendums to give people a greater say in decision making that they introduced the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. That showed us that they were serious and that they had a long-term plan to keep on holding referendums. What happened?

The Government promised a referendum on the euro, but every public opinion poll has shown that, even if they held a referendum, they would not win it. The same is true of the constitution. The Prime Minister uses all sorts of excuses. First he says it is a matter for Parliament, and he prays in aid the fact—I shall say this very slowly—that an EU constitution is not a constitutional matter. Discuss. We will try and discuss it as much as we can. It is illogical to suggest that a matter to which so much time has been devoted and on which there is a document on the table entitled "EU Constitution" is not a constitutional matter.

I shall indulge myself by elaborating on the question that I intended to put the Prime Minister. There has been a lot of talk about a speech made in Berlin on the EU constitution, but one speech was made before my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition made his, and that was the speech made by the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson). In Berlin, in 1998, he said:

> "Today, people want to be more involved. Tony Blair's Government has already held two referendums and three more are at some stage in prospect, not to mention more citizens' movements, more action from pressure groups. Democracy and legitimacy need constant renewal. They need to be redefined with each generation. Representative government is being complemented by more direct forms of involvement from the internet to referendums. This requires a different style of politics and we are trying to respond to these changes."

It has been clear from the beginning of this Labour Government that referendums are on the agenda. They were part of the game plan. But now when the really big one comes up—

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): They are bottling out.

Mrs. Browning: They are bottling out. I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

[Mrs. Browning]

If I am ever fortunate enough to be successful again in the ballot for Prime Minister's questions, I shall return to that subject because the British people deserve to have a say in a constitution.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. At least five, perhaps six, hon. Members are trying to catch my eye in the remaining 60 or so minutes available. In a spirit of good will as Easter approaches, perhaps hon. Members will have regard to their colleagues so that everyone can be fitted in.

4.36 pm

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I have great sympathy with the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning). I had Question 6 to the Prime Minister yesterday, and I was not called, and if the House will indulge me further in terms of time, I simply point out that Government Back Benchers have a much more difficult task in catching Mr. Speaker's eye because of our numbers.

I want to raise the issue of how preserving people's security can give rise to a tension with maintaining our democratic liberties. Unfortunately, debate on this issue in this House, the other place and outside is often bedevilled by the failure of many of those claiming to protect our liberties to acknowledge the concerns of ordinary people, from antisocial behaviour to terrorist threats. They use a traditional stylised analysis that fails to connect with such concerns. That is sometimes coupled with claims to a moral rectitude, which frankly sticks in my craw. I claim no monopoly of concern, conscience or wisdom in the remarks that I am about to make.

I take as an example the concern about terrorism of the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). I acknowledge at the outset that there is a real danger that our response to terrorism may undermine the very democratic values that we seek to uphold. As my noble Friend the Attorney-General said in a thoughtful speech last night to the Bar parliamentary group, our response cannot be simply a utilitarian calculation, weighing the rights of security of the many against the legal rights of the few. That would ignore the values on which our democratic society is built. We must approach the issue as a matter of moral principle, not simply as a matter of pure self-interest.

That is why on various occasions, including previous recess debates, I have raised my concerns about Guantanamo bay, which is an American own goal. The detentions there impose grave harm on the detainees when, in the absence of proper judicial scrutiny, we can only speculate whether it is for the benefit of the American people or of people elsewhere, such as the United Kingdom.

We face, of course, a serious terrorist threat—its seriousness is underlined by the arrests earlier this week. Al-Qaeda and its sympathisers are of a completely different character from terrorists in the past. They are a global, messianic movement and they are not concerned about destroying innocent lives in the pursuit of their unachievable goal of overthrowing western civilisation.

How should we respond? We must respond in accordance with law, mindful that, as Lord Hoffmann said in the Rehman case,

"in matters of national security the cost of failure can be high".

Provisions such as the Explosive Substances Act 1883, which catches terrorist bombing, have been on the statute book for many years, and the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 approach the problem in the same way. The width of the offences is sometimes criticised, but the criticism mainly concerns the enforcement of the legislation, to which I shall return.

In the main, we have met the terrorist threat in a traditional way, in accordance with law and our principles of civil liberties and human rights. The one exception is part 4 of the 2001 Act, which allows for the detention of foreign nationals certified by the Home Secretary as a risk to national security and as suspected terrorists. Such foreign nationals cannot be deported because we cannot guarantee their human rights, so they can be detained indefinitely under the 2001 Act.

Without further measures, that power of detention would be unacceptable and the report by Lord Newton of Braintree and other Privy Councillors that those provisions should be repealed would be compelling. However, the Special Immigration Appeals Commission, which is a court of record with the right to appeal to the Court of Appeal, regularly reviews the detention of persons under part 4. SIAC may use intelligence information that is not available to the defendant, but that is seen by special advocates appointed to act on behalf of detainees. It is a further point in support of our independent Bar—I declare an interest at this point—that those advocates are of the highest competence and integrity.

Examples such as last year's Ajouaou case show the thoroughness with which SIAC approaches such matters. More recently the case of M, which was upheld by the Court of Appeal, shows that SIAC is no pushover. Frankly, the alternatives advanced in the Privy Councillors' report such as surveillance and tagging will not work with the most determined terrorists. Moreover, there could well be a temptation towards a greater intrusion on to civil liberties by use of such alternatives against a range of people, including those with only a tangential connection with wrongdoing. By contrast, the Home Secretary has certified only 17 people.

Lord Woolf's judgment in the M case, which I have mentioned, is a balanced appreciation of the problem, and an acceptance that the legislation gets it right. His judgment, and the recent remarks by the eminent legal scholar Professor Ronald Dworkin, fortify me in my support for the Government on this issue when we went into the Lobby on 25 February.

I was pleased that one aspect of the problem is raised in the White Paper, "One Step Ahead: A 21st Century Strategy to Defeat Organised Criminals", which the Home Secretary published earlier this week. The White Paper mentions review of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, which prevents the use of intercepted material in court proceedings, and I am glad that it is being reviewed.

I shall return to the enforcement of the Terrorism Act 2000. Earlier this year, the Home Secretary told me in a written answer that of the 530 people arrested under the 2000 Act, about half were released without charge. When my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) asked a similar question, she was told that no record is kept of how many of those people are Muslims. There is disquiet in the Muslim community about the use of the 2000 Act, however justified the 2000 Act may be—it is comparable to the feeling among the Irish community a quarter of a century ago. We must reassure the Muslim community that there is no persecution, and we must also assuage any Islamophobia in the general population.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister praised Iqbal Sacranie for his remarks on those issues. This week, I have spoken several times to Khurshid Ahmed, the chair of the National Association of British Pakistanis and a member of the Commission for Racial Equality, who echoed Mr. Sacranie's views that terrorism should be utterly condemned as being contrary to Islam and that those in the Muslim community who suspect terrorism must report it. Mr. Ahmed also made the valid point that we must address the disillusion among young Muslim men that can tempt them down the terrorist path. One cause of that is the considerable underachievement of Muslim young people in education.

We have only just had the Third Reading of the Higher Education Bill. I do not want to go over that ground again, but having failed to catch the Speaker's eye on Second Reading on 27 January, I want to say three things about the role of universities that were neglected in the debate.

First, universities are engaged in the search for truth. That is a justification for academic freedom, since the search for truth can sometimes rub up against vested interests or the powers that be. The search for truth is often conducted at a theoretical level—a level of generality—that does not have an immediate application to everyday life. The search for truth leads to a deeper understanding of ourselves and the world, and that can function to transmit through the generations a common culture and civilisation.

Secondly, universities educate. Their role is in educating students to live life to the full through the acquisition of skills and through fostering imagination and creativity. All those who are able to benefit from a university education should have an equal opportunity to do so, because it involves not only personal fulfilment, but potential gain. Confucius said that it was not easy "to find someone who had studied for three years without aiming at pay".

Thirdly, universities fulfil a utilitarian function. Discoveries, especially in science and medicine, can have profound benefits for society. Students graduate and contribute to society through their work. Universities educate foreign students and contribute to Britain's invisibles. And so it goes on. However, although it is vital, that utilitarian function can never be the sole justification for universities.

I spent a great deal of my adult career in universities. In the 1980s and 1990s, I saw how they suffered very much from a real reduction in funding as the staff-student ratio went up. George Walden, the former Member for Buckingham, described it as "mass cultivation on the cheap". The Government have put in additional money since 1997, but I saw the Higher Education Bill as the only way forward in terms of providing further financial support for universities, and I had no compunction about supporting it.

These recess Adjournment debates are invaluable not only in providing an opportunity for Members to put specific points, but in allowing us to raise more general issues, as I have. I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and other hon. Members a productive and restful recess.

4.47 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I have often thought that the questions which we were unable to ask and the speeches that we never had a chance to deliver were probably the best ones. Today's debate has proved it to me, because there have been excellent contributions all round. Alternatively, perhaps it is because as it is not Government business and there is no Whip, Members can use their intellect and display their true integrity.

I want to speak in support of some of the speeches. The contribution by the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) was admirable in every respect, particularly his allegation to the effect that Lord Richard is getting too big for his boots. He proposed that increasing the quangocracy, which is what the Welsh Assembly has become, would not benefit the people of Wales. As the hon. Member for Hornchurch (John Cryer) so wisely pointed out, the imposition of STV—the single transferable vote—would make that Assembly even less democratic.

I was most interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), who perhaps represents the municipal arm of old Labour. He rather reminded me of a smoother version of the "Peter Simple" character—the craggy-visaged, iron-watch-chained chairman of the Bradford tramways and fine arts committee. Nevertheless, he made the extremely important point that the transformation—or modernisation, as I suppose we must call it—of local government has in practical terms diminished the direct accountability of local authorities to their electorate. I also support his calling into question of the role of cabinets and elected mayors.

I support the speeches made by the countryside element among my hon. Friends. I speak for the suburbs, but my hon. Friends the Members for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) speak for the countryside—Yorkshire and the west country, respectively. They made important points, especially about the malign effect of the common agricultural policy on our countryside. I know the uplands of the north of England well, because I lived in the north Pennines for 17 years. The reduction of support prices for sheep and cattle production would be absolutely disastrous. My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton, who is always a lady of conscience and sensibility, was right to explain to us how awful the countryside of Dartmoor, Exmoor and the New Forest would be without ponies if they were all shipped off live for slaughter on the continent. We must address those problems.

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

I want to talk about a smaller matter. It is a specific transport link that is at the other end of the problem described by the hon. Member for Hornchurch. He talked about the docklands light railway, and I want to talk about the Croxley link. I do not know whether you know much about the Croxley link, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I assure you that I shall try, in an exceedingly short time, to describe its merits. There is a little, disused branch line that goes through Croxley green from Watford. Everybody knows about the Metropolitan line because they read John Betjeman, and they know how lovely the places that lie along the line are—especially my constituency. If the branch line were restored to service, Metropolitan line tube trains could go along the Croxley link—through the centre of Watford—to Watford junction main railway station, which gives people the opportunity to take trains to Birmingham, the north-west and beyond.

At little cost, such a measure would have an immensely beneficial effect on an important industrial area. The hon. Member for Hornchurch said that the Thames gateway was an important economic area, and for me and my constituents, such an area is the north-west corridor. We were promised Crossrail down the north-west corridor from Aylesbury to Amersham—through my constituency—and I fought hard for a Crossrail stop in Northwood so that people could link up to Paddington, the City, Stratford and beyond. We will now be lucky to get Crossrail running even from Heathrow—through the centre of London—to the east of the capital, so it is almost impossible to imagine Crossrail going down the north-west corridor. If the Croxley link were built, it would at least be a substitute, at modest cost, for some of the potential that Crossrail could have offered.

My constituents have to struggle through traffic to get to Watford general hospital, and to Watford—for shopping—or the main line station. Such a journey is exceedingly difficult without the link. The Metropolitan line ends at Watford tube station, which is 2.5 miles from Watford's main line station. I see that the shadow Leader of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), is taking notes; as a Hertfordshire Member, he understands the problem well. The process represents a good Conservative principle, because public services would be greatly enhanced at only modest cost. My constituents would benefit, Watford would benefit, and so would the country.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Street crime in Castle Point is spiralling out of control, as it is in Essex and elsewhere in the country. There are now threats of vigilante action in my constituency. The police are often blamed, but that is quite wrong. Many of us must accept the blame—the police have only a small part of it. Those who are most to blame must be the parents of the children who are out on the streets because they do not take an interest in knowing where their children are, what they are doing, or the time of night at which they do it. They do not seem to take control action to stop them. I want parents to be given more information by the police about what is going on and to be encouraged to control their children's actions. That differs from the politically correct attitude that we have seen in recent years, especially from new Labour Members, preventing parents from taking appropriate action to control their children's behaviour.

My local police are under great pressure. The Home Secretary and the Essex police authority have presided over a shortfall in my local police force—the Castle Point and Rayleigh division—of some 27.7 per cent. It is operating at almost a third under establishment for various reasons. That is partly why street crime in Castle Point has been getting out of control. That situation cannot continue. The police authority and the Home Secretary must accept responsibility and give the local chief superintendent, John Mauger, more resources and more police officers whom he can put on the beat so that the problem can be solved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) and I met Chief Superintendent Mauger last week. There is a plan of action to tackle the major problems in our area. The local police will go out on the streets and additional numbers will be provided for a short time. I call on them to show no tolerance of antisocial behaviour, youth nuisance or straightforward thuggery. I call on the Crown Prosecution Service to prosecute offences whenever they can, and on the courts to impose exemplary sentences that will deter louts who spoil everything for our communities. Many hon. Members share my anxieties about the growth of street nuisance.

Last week, the National Audit Office published "The Drug Treatment and Testing Order: Early Lessons". The lessons were that only 28 per cent. of drug treatment orders were completed satisfactorily. Seventy per cent. of participants continued to test positive for opiates after 12 months, and reconviction rates two years after commencement of the orders were as high as 80 per cent.—far higher than the reconviction rates of criminals in general. The National Audit Office suggests a range of administrative improvements, which might help to bring the treatment regimes up to the standard of the best.

I want to consider the new evidence that is emerging in France. As hon. Members know, I do not often speak kindly about what goes on in France, but when we can learn from the French, we should be prepared to do that. Treatment appears to be working much better in France than here and it therefore offers better value for money. We should enjoy the benefits of the French success.

A follow-up of 300 drug-dependent patients in France, treated by general practitioners—I stress that the treatment was by GPs, similar to the old regime in Britain—showed a retention rate of 88 per cent., in a complete inversion of what is happening in Britain. Seventy per cent. of patients had stopped taking heroin. Although the figures for reconviction are not strictly comparable, delinquency in France was measured at only 7 per cent. in the follow-up.

The French widely use buprenorphine rather than methadone for maintenance because it acts as an antidote to itself in higher doses. That means that there is no point in ramping the dose and almost no black market, and that it is safe and effective to prescribe through the GP network. The results are startling. It is well worth the National Audit Office considering the French experience. France has found a far more cost-effective way in which to deal with the massive social and criminal problems that are caused by opiate addiction. We must be prepared to learn from this and spread good practice and success.

Arthritis is a crippling and debilitating disease for which there is no cure. It is progressive and attacks young and old alike. It affects 12,000 people in Castle Point and 12,000 people in Southend, West. Indeed, it affects, on average, 15 per cent. of all our constituents and is the biggest cause of disability in Britain today. Worst of all, it is very painful for those who suffer from it.

I want to bring two astounding facts to the attention of the House. The first is that one in four GP visits are associated with arthritis. The second, which is linked to that, is that the GP contract mentions diabetes, cancer, cardiac problems and obesity but makes no mention of arthritis. That must be an oversight, and I hope that the Secretary of State for Health will readdress the priority given to arthritis. I recommend to the House a publication called "OA nation—the most comprehensive UK report of people with osteoarthritis", which was launched by Arthritis Care this week in the Palace of Westminster.

I can never speak in these debates without mentioning Cyprus, as hon. Members will know. Kofi Annan's upbeat announcement has shown that he has brokered a deal, and that a referendum can probably now take place in both parts of the Cypriot community. If Mr. Papadopoulos, DISY and AKEL are going to recommend a yes vote, as may be the case, perhaps we can wish them luck and hope that that goes forward. Cypriots deserve a just settlement that will allow them to grow together as a single community, and to make up for the past by working together in the future. I am sure, however, that there should be no permanent derogation from Europe on the occupation of that island by troops under the control of another nation. That would be simply intolerable and probably have the effect of a blackball in any referendum. We all wish the settlement process well, but it will be just the start of the rebuilding of a single island, rather than the end.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): At The Hague in 2003, the Secretary-General of the UN, Kofi Annan, said that the preconditions for a successful settlement were that there should be "an unequivocally-stated preparedness on the part of the leaders of both sides, fully and determinedly backed at the highest political level in both motherlands, to commit . . . to finalise the plan (without re-opening its basic principles or essential trade-offs)".

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the two conditions are that all the parties should sign up to the agreement, and that essential principles and trade-offs stand in any final agreement?

Bob Spink: Yes, indeed. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I was pleased to see how many concessions were made by the Greek side, but equally disappointed that Rauf Denktash, for the Turkish side, did not even attend the recent talks. That was a great disappointment.

I shall move on to talk briefly about hospices. They play a very special part in health care provision, and I should like to praise the dedication, care and love shown by all hospice workers, organisers, volunteers and fundraisers. They do a superb job, cheerfully and happily helping people at a devastating time in their lives. I keep telling the House that Government funding of hospices needs to be reviewed, but we see no action. In the average adult hospice, 20 per cent. of funding comes from Government money; that figure is 5 per cent. for the average children's hospice. The children's hospice in my constituency, Little Haven, receives only 1.5 per cent. of its funding from public money. That is unsustainable.

Conservative policy is that all hospices, for both adults and children, should receive 40 per cent. of their funds from public money, and I hope that the Government will take that on board and reconsider hospice funding. That 40 per cent. funding would enable hospices to remain independent. The very small amounts of lottery— New Opportunities Fund—money that is now being fed through to the hospice movement is not the answer, and that funding is not guaranteed in the future. I congratulate the campaigning News Shopper, which has been fighting for hospice funding justice for more than a year and has consistently called on the Government to address the issue. I congratulate the News Shopper, the Basildon Evening Echo and all the local campaigning groups on putting pressure on the Government, as we have done, to give hospices a fair funding deal.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): If we are to have civilisation, we need international law. In recent years, the United Nations has set up war crimes tribunals for Rwanda and for the former republic of Yugoslavia. The International Criminal Court has been set up and is now investigating the possibility of war crimes in northern Uganda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

I want to speak about Sierra Leone. Sierra Leone was devastated by conflict for 10 years. It was not ethnic, tribal or religious conflict, but conflict deliberately stirred up by people such as Charles Taylor, who wanted to control that country's diamond assets. In June 2000, the Government of Sierra Leone wrote to the United Nations Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, requesting assistance in setting up a war crimes tribunal. In August 2000, under UN resolution 1315, the Security Council set up a war crimes tribunal. I was fortunate to be present at the opening of the special court for Sierra Leone on 10 March this year. The Government were represented by the Secretary of State for International Development and the Solicitor-General.

The war crimes tribunal has indicted a number of people. I suspect that one reason why Colonel Gaddafi has come into line is that it was clear that he was in danger of being indicted. One of those indicted was Charles Taylor, the former President of Liberia. The indictment—I have a copy of it with me—runs to 20 or so pages of offences against humanity committed by Taylor. It says that he received military training in Libya in the late 1980s, and goes on to describe how he sought to obtain access to the mineral wealth, and particularly the diamond wealth, of Sierra Leone. The crimes alleged in the indictment include killings, abductions, forced labour, physical and sexual violence, use of child soldiers, and looting and burning of civilian structures.

[Tony Baldry]

Those terms do not really describe the brutality of what happened. People were skinned alive. People were asked whether they wanted to be left-handed or right-handed, and depending on their answer, either their left or right arms were amputated. Soldiers would take bets when they bayoneted pregnant women on whether the foetus was male or female. Some horrific barbarism occurred at the start of the 21st century, but Taylor was indicted, and I have no doubt that that was one reason why he was brought down in Liberia.

Taylor left Liberia and is now in Nigeria. The point of my speech is that I find it wholly unacceptable that a Commonwealth country—possibly the leading Commonwealth country in west Africa—is harbouring a man who has been indicted by a UN-backed war crimes tribunal. The President of Nigeria purportedly granted political asylum to Taylor last August. At the time of Taylor's arrival in Nigeria, he was specifically excluded from the scope of refugee and asylum protection by section 20 of Nigeria's Asylum Act, which states:

"when there are serious reasons to believe that" a person

"has committed a crime against peace, a war crime or a crime against humanity, as in any international instrument to which Nigeria is a party and which has been drawn up to make provisions in respect of such crimes" that person should not be granted refuge. Clearly, Nigeria has considerable obligations under international law.

Those of us who are concerned about international development welcomed the New Partnership for Africa's Development—NEPAD—but NEPAD was a contract, under which we would give more development assistance to Africa in exchange for Africa doing a number of things, not least peer review. Surely the least that countries such as Nigeria should do is hand over war criminals so that they can stand trial.

Colleagues in the United States Congress have been much more robust than we have been. Senator Judd Gregg, chairman of the Senate appropriations sub-committee on commerce, justice, state and the judiciary, has been quoted as saying

"Charles Taylor was one the chief instigators of the campaign of terror undertaken by the rebel group Revolutionary United Front during the conflict in Sierra Leone . . . By exiling Charles Taylor to Nigeria, it was hoped that his ability to further destabilize West African nations—including his own country of Liberia—would be eliminated . . . The terms of Mr. Taylor's asylum were clear: he was to completely disengage himself from the day to day affairs . . . of Liberia. However, Taylor has broken—flagrantly—the terms of this agreement . . . It is now time for Charles Taylor to answer for his crimes, and it is my hope that the State Department will work with the Nigerian Government to arrange Taylor's swift handover to the Special Court. Until Taylor is put in a place where he can do no further damage, all the efforts we have made will be lost. There is no place where justice can be served except in Freetown, Sierra Leone, the home of the Special Court."

When I was in Freetown, everyone told me that the work of the special court would not be completed until Taylor was brought to justice.

A woman from Sierra Leone, Aminatta Forna, author of "The Devil That Danced on Water", which was shortlisted for the Samuel Johnson prize for non-fiction, says

"The court"

—the special court, that is—

"has one year left to fulfil its brief. If prosecutors succeed in bringing Taylor to face trial then it will have earned its place in history. If not, then millions will have been spent on the convictions of possibly no more than nine people.

The sense of law, of justice in this post-war society has become so warped, so removed from reality that one woman kidnapped by rebel soldiers and forced to act as a nurse believed until the end of the interview that it was she who was to be charged. In fact she was seen as a potential witness.

For the people of Sierra Leone, justice of some sort must be seen to be done. After all, what if the world had turned their backs? What if the Special Court had not existed at all?"

I urge Her Majesty's Government to bring to bear such pressure as is reasonable on Nigeria—a fellow Commonwealth country and a leading member of the Commonwealth in west Africa—to accept that now is the time to hand over Taylor for trial to a United Nations-backed war crimes tribunal.

5.12 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I want to raise a number of points. The first concerns law and order. There is no doubt that the British Government are letting the British people down in that regard. In the present climate, the criminal has absolutely no fear—but the law-abiding citizen certainly has.

Only last week, my mother, who lives in a London borough and is in her 90s, answered the door in the morning to a water board attendant. Stupidly—she now says—she let him in. By the time he had left, she had discovered that he had stolen every brass penny she had. The police were magnificent; they took fingerprints. It seems that she was about the third in line.

That says it all. Criminals no longer wait until it is dark; they act morning, noon and night. Southend is no different from anywhere else in that respect. I had a useful exchange in Westminster Hall last week with the Minister responsible for policing, who kindly offered to consider a number of the points that I had raised. The Government will claim that things are getting better, but that is not how the public see it. They want a more visible police force.

There are certainly plenty of speed cameras. In answer to an oral question, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), challenged me to find examples of constituents who were just over the speed limit. I have now found an example, and I await the Minister's reaction with interest.

I am delighted that the local newspaper, the Yellow Advertiser, is launching a campaign this week called "More feet on the beat." It is to be led by the editor, Graeme Allen, and one of the reporters, Luke Walsh. The Home Secretary will get coupons telling him that the general public feel that he should provide sufficient funding for 10 extra police to patrol the streets in the Southend police division. I was recently on a Health Committee visit to Odense, where we saw at first hand the wonderful impact on law enforcement and the reassurance to the general public that is provided by police officers getting on their bikes. I have a letter from the chief constable of Essex, who reassured me that he would look at the issue.

I salute the owner of a large retail chain called Choice, who is issuing carrier bags that say, "We support Crimestoppers." When I told the Minister responsible for policing about it, she was encouraged; it is another matter for her to look at carefully. At the moment, Leigh police station is closed in the evenings and Eastwood station is open occasionally, but Westcliffe station is now closed. My constituency is No. 1 in the country for people aged between 100 and 110. They need reassurance through the greater visibility of our policemen and women.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): My hon. Friend will be aware that the level of policing is a big issue across south Essex and was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink). Does he agree that we need not only more regular police officers in Essex, but more special constables, who play a vital role in reinforcing the police, particularly at peak periods on Friday and Saturday nights?

Mr. Amess: I agree and I am advised that 90 special constables are in the process of being recruited.

I have mentioned on many occasions my constituent Maajid Nawaz, who was held in prison for two years. Last week, he went to court with two other detainees and was found guilty of belonging to the Islamic liberation movement that apparently wants to overthrow the Egyptian Government. They were sentenced to five years in prison. I went to see them in prison and there is no doubt that the charges are trumped up. I believe the family completely.

The families are upset about the way the matter has been dealt with. I am advised by the brother of Maajid Nawaz that following the announcement of the verdict, the Government said that they respected the decision and that Britain could not intervene in the course of justice or the courts of another country.

I am pleading with the Minister because we have only four weeks to act. He must speak to the Prime Minister to get him to intervene. Incidentally, all three detainees got the same sentence of five years, but they were not found guilty of the same crime. In Egypt, an appeal depends on the written explanation of the verdict, which has not been delivered by the judge. The Prime Minister must intervene immediately because, within four weeks, President Mubarak will be asked to ratify the sentence or approve the writing of the explanation. After that, we will all be wasting our time.

I hope that the Prime Minister will intervene because the families are distraught. He is always telling us that he is happy to see Members of Parliament, but he has not been happy to see me and the other Members involved. I would have thought that, under the circumstances, he could at the very least agree to see the Members of Parliament involved—alone if he insisted, or with the families. The Prime Minister intervened on behalf of two nurses who were convicted of murdering another nurse in Saudi Arabia, even though the evidence was overwhelmingly against them. It seems that he is able to intervene on some occasions. I ask the Minister to do what he can to persuade the Prime Minister to intervene quickly in that case.

My constituent, Simon Matthison, has been held in prison in France since 1 December. His mother, Mrs. Calderwood, has been to see me at one of my surgeries because she is concerned about her son's health while he is in prison in France. He suffers from Addison's disease and many other health problems, for all of which he takes medication. His consultant physician has contacted me and advised me that those are serious conditions and that doses of medication for them need careful monitoring.

Although Simon is apparently being seen by a general practitioner in France, he is not getting the specialist treatment that he needs. Will the Minister send a message to the British embassy in France? I am not asking him to judge whether Simon is being held in prison rightly. He was accused of trying to smuggle illegal drugs into the UK in a sealed trailer that he had driven from Spain. He claims that he had no idea that the drugs were in the trailer, but I am not asking the Minister to intervene on that point. I ask only that he talk to the Foreign Office to get our embassy to ensure that Simon Matthison receives the correct treatment for his health problems.

The South East Essex Advocacy for Older People was founded in 1994 with originally just one member of staff. It has now expanded to include six paid members of staff and 14 volunteers. It does an absolutely wonderful job supporting people aged over 60 who suffer from Alzheimer's or other problems, and making representations on their behalf. That advocacy organisation would not survive were it not for its success with its community fund application. During the past year, it has received more than 600 inquiries, resulting in 400 case loads. I salute it; it does a magnificent job. Will the Minister ensure that it has more certainty over its funding?

A constituent of mine, Peter Little, is involved in a dispute with Lloyds TSB. He and his wife were mis-sold a critical illness insurance policy in October 1999, which stated that it was regulated by the Personal Investment Authority. When Mr. Little tried to claim, owing to his wife's failing health—they have small children—he was unable to do so. When he read the policy's small print, he found to his horror that he was not insured, and on investigating further, he found that the policy was not regulated by the Financial Services Authority. Mr. and Mrs. Little felt that they were banging their heads against a brick wall when they contacted the FSA and the ombudsman. Will the Minister ask the appropriate Department to examine that case? Mr. Little has proved through his bank statements that his policy should have covered his present circumstances. I would have expected Lloyds TSB to have behaved better than it appears to have done on that matter. Will the Minister find out why that bank is selling insurance policies that are not regulated by the FSA?

I am happy to keep spending my £5 each week on the national lottery, and I am not totally embittered that I have not won too much money, but it is an absolute disgrace that my Southend, West constituency continues to be third from the bottom in the list of the 659 constituencies for receiving lottery funds. Why is it right that Southend receives £1 million while Greenwich and Woolwich receives £689,209,982? In other words, Southend, West receives 0.002 per cent. of that received by Greenwich and Woolwich. I ask the Deputy Leader of the House to have a word with the appropriate authorities to ensure that Southend, West gets a far better share of national lottery funding.

Finally, I hope that the House, given its jolly atmosphere as we approach the Easter recess, will join me in congratulating Southend United—the Shrimpers—on reaching the final of the LDV Vans trophy. I was delighted to travel by car, with my family, to the venue for last Sunday's final. It was a 430-mile round trip. Thousands of people from Southend went. We lost the match 2–0. The first goal was definitely offside, and I shall not go into too much detail about the second, but I congratulate the team—including the manager, Steve Tilson, and the chairman, Ron Martin—on an absolutely magnificent job and on representing our town so well.

5.26 pm

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): At the end of term, one has a dilemma: whether to rush back to the delights of one's constituency, or to remain here to the end in the hope of making a telling contribution in the interest of one's constituents. If my colleagues in government are moved to respond to my plea today, the self-denial involved in not rushing back will have been worth while.

My concern is similar to that of other Members: transport. Although my constituency is only 60 miles from London and 40 miles from the channel tunnel, Hastings is the 28th poorest town in Britain, and the reason is transport. As a result of the Government's commitment to regeneration, we are doing much better than we were, but Hastings remains the 28th poorest town in Britain. We have received £50 million in regeneration money, which equates to £1,000 per household. Compared with the £18.50 shortfall in council tax contribution per household, that constitutes a pretty good profit. Under the leadership of councillor Jeremy Birch, the brilliant Hastings borough council is making a difference.

Transport remains an encumbrance. The rail links are awful and despite the nice new trains, it takes two hours to get to London. Two hours is a long time to travel 60 miles. The line linking us to Europe consists of a single track, so if a breakdown occurs, Europe is closed.

I want to concentrate, though, on the A21. It is known locally as the "snail trail", but it is worse than that, because snails do not travel that slowly. A21 users cannot travel fast, and when they try to do so lots of accidents occur. It is a very dangerous road—perhaps one of the most dangerous in Britain. Indeed, it is credited with changing British history. It is said that King Harold was held up on the A21 on his way to the battle of Hastings, and that as a result William was well ensconced before the battle commenced. It is certainly true that using the A21 to travel back to one's constituency is an exhausting experience.

We have been promised improvements and I am pleased to say that one such—the Lamberhurst bypass—is under way. But my first plea is that we need more. I ask the Government to announce very soon the other planned improvements to the A21 south of Lamberhurst.

My final point—it is the real reason that I asked to speak today—relates to a particular decision of the Highways Agency and the way in which such decisions are taken, of which I learned only this morning. The agency has decided to de-dual the only stretch of dual carriageway road between my constituency and Pembury. Some 1.7 km of dual carriageway—the only stretch of that road on which one can overtake—will be turned into a single carriageway. That is a crazy decision. It was taken because many accidents occur there, but I wish that the agency would consult local Members before taking such decisions. Indeed, perhaps it should have consulted Ministers on this decision, given that it was a wholly administrative one.

Of course, if de-dualling takes place the accidents will simply be displaced. If the road consists of 15 miles of single carriageway and people have to wait for an opportunity to overtake that does not come, they will take even more dangerous decisions. It is a bit like crime. Although I am happy that it is falling overall, some of it gets displaced, and the same applies to accidents.

My final plea is for the Minister to pass on my concerns to his colleagues in the Department for Transport. First, let us soon hear departmental announcements about improvements to the A21. Secondly, please do not de-dual the only piece of dual carriageway on the road. While we are waiting for the main announcements, let us find other methods of ensuring better safety on that very dangerous road.

5.30 pm

Dr. Rudi Vis (Finchley and Golders Green) (Lab): I have raised the issue of Cyprus in many previous Adjournment debates, and it is particularly appropriate to do so again today, because it was decided only yesterday that there will be a referendum on 24 April in both the Greek Cypriot republic and in the occupied part of Cyprus on the Annan plan to unite the island. If the result were yes in both referendums, Cyprus would enter the European Union in its entirety on 1 May 2004. If either side were to vote no, only the republic of Cyprus would join the EU on 1 May.

I have wanted a free, united and democratic Cyprus for as long as I can remember. Now that we are on the threshold of a decision, I should be pleased. Yet I am not. More importantly, tens of thousands of Greek and Turkish Cypriots are not pleased either. There is particular anger in the Greek Cypriot community in Cyprus and in this country—and for some very good reasons. I should like to mention just a few of those reasons to give a flavour of the failings of the Annan proposals.

Annan does away with the many UN resolutions against Turkey concerning Cyprus. Annan suggests that many of the cases against Turkey before the European Court of Human Rights should be withdrawn. Annan will allow a continuing Turkish military presence in Cyprus. Annan proposes an almost two-state Cyprus, as was always wanted by the putative leader of the occupied territory, Mr. Denktash. Annan allows no real freedom of movement. Annan allows decades before property and land will be sorted out for the 200,000 Greek Cypriots who fled in 1974 as a result of the Turkish occupation.

Annan does not guarantee full functionality so that the new state can function smoothly within the EU. Annan does not resolve the situation of the enclaved and does not allow voting rights for the hundreds of thousands of Greek Cypriots affected by the occupation in 1974 who now live abroad, but he does allow the voting rights of the tens of thousands of Anatolians who were imported into Cyprus from Turkey.

I have not exhausted the reasons for the genuine anger of the Greek Cypriots, and I have not noted the anger of Turkish Cypriots who feel politically emasculated by the Turkish presence. Our Government, in their rush to sort out one problem and commence on another problem—to start negotiating with Turkey for EU membership—back up all that confusion and anger. I sincerely hope that the Foreign Office will bear those difficulties in mind. I also hope that the Greek Cypriots will vote no in the referendum on 24 April.

Bob Spink: I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's list and I noticed that he failed to mention that Annan also makes no proposals to provide incentives for settlers to return to mainland Turkey. That is another negative point about the Annan proposals.

Dr. Vis: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. That could easily be done: plans are afoot, but Annan makes no contribution.

I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and all hon. Members a pleasant recess.

5.34 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): We have had an excellent debate. As is always the case with such debates, it showed the House in its best light, as right hon. and hon. Members on both sides raised subjects of genuine concern to them and their constituents. We have even heard about the Shrimpers, who I gather were robbed by a referee's decision—that, at least, is the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess).

The hon. Member for Finchley and Golders Green (Dr. Vis) raised the subject of Cyprus, as did other Members. The whole House sends the people of Cyprus our wish that they find a way forward that unites them and enables them to join the European Union as one country.

Bob Spink: They will anyway.

Mr. Heald: Indeed. But the widely shared concerns that have been expressed are about the exact mechanics of the process.

There was much discussion of the situation in Wales and of the Richard commission. Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) is no longer in the Chamber, as I wanted to give him some extremely bad news from a book called "Ayes to the Left", written in 1995 by the present Leader of the House, and in which he describes the future for Wales. He wrote:

"A Welsh Parliament would begin by having its own legislative powers confined . . . But in time—and as Britain moved towards a federal structure—greater legislative and revenue raising powers could be obtained."

That was a straw in the wind in 1995.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) came up with a principle that found strong support on the Conservative Benches—indeed, we might even describe it in future as the Lucas principle. It was that there should be a referendum on matters that involve constitutional changes. That is a principle that finds ready acceptance among my hon. Friends and, indeed, among Members on both sides of the House—even the Liberal Democrats appear to be nodding.

Ian Lucas: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in the case of the Conservative party, that principle would be entirely novel?

Mr. Heald: I forget how many referendums the Government have held—about 37 so far.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): How many have the Conservatives held?

Mr. Heald: We have had the odd one or two, as the hon. Gentleman may recall, although I think in fact it was only one—[Interruption.] Yes, yes. We had one.

Ian Lucas: What about?

Mr. Heald: The Ulster border poll. Not everyone can remember that. The hon. Gentleman is clearly a strong Unionist. His attack on the National Assembly for Wales may have been slightly veiled, but he clearly was not keen that the Assembly should succeed in its ambition to have the right to make primary legislation. He was not at all keen on what the Assembly had done to the health service in Wales, and he seemed to feel that the lack of top-up fees in Wales would cause considerable difficulties.

The hon. Gentleman's colleague, the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent, went all the way. He said that the bonfire of the quangos had not occurred and made it extremely clear that he would resist giving the Assembly any further powers. It would be interesting to hear from the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons—especially given his boss's position—what his perspective is on those issues. Will he follow what the present Leader of the House was saying in 1995, so that the process is more and more in favour of a devolved Parliament; or will he tell us that enough is enough and that, in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), the Richard commission has got far too big for its boots?

The hon. Member for Hornchurch (John Cryer) made some interesting remarks—as usual. I recall especially his comments on mobile phone masts—a subject of concern to Members on both sides of the House. I am certainly concerned; indeed, last night I presented a petition from Royston with 1,633 signatures. The petition was against a mast that NTL had to remove because it did not comply with planning permission, but the company plans to put it up again right next to a primary school, so of course parents are saying that they may have to take their children away from the school. EDF, the owner of the site, has offered to forgo the rent if NTL leaves the site, so its contractual obligations would cease. A local councillor, Tony Hunter, spent hours looking for an alternative site, yet when he found one, NTL would not even negotiate with the land agents. The subject is dear to my heart, and I shall mention it again—that is a promise.

We had some very interesting contributions about trains. The hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) mentioned his service in Hastings. We heard a strong plea for the Croxley link, from my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). We also heard a strong plea that the docklands light railway should join up with Hornchurch.

The debate had a rural flavour, with contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) and for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning). I should not forget that we want Major Perkins to get his tax refund. I hope that the Minister has written that one down.

On law and order, we had contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and a cameo intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois). The point that they were making is that, under this Government, criminals have become quite brazen and are robbing people, even in daylight. There just are not enough police on the beat in south Essex. That is why the local paper is running the strong campaign that we heard about. However, the more general point is that policing seems to have become a very intellectual exercise these days, with intelligence-led policing and a reactive approach to policing. A lot of people believe that a strong, visible police presence on the streets is required if we are to have the firm control that we need in our society.

The hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) referred to terrorism and made some important points about the law. We also heard a strong plea about the war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone, from my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry). I join in his plea to the Government about Nigeria. It is wrong that someone who is clearly a war criminal, or at least indicted as such, should be given safe haven in a Commonwealth country.

On defence, the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) again raised the issue of equipment for our armed forces. It seems shocking that there are three examples in a relative small area of the country where the kit that the armed forces need simply was not available. Although he did not mention this, one of the most startling parts of the report on the issue was the reference to tanks not having the correct filters to deal with certain weapons of mass destruction. The Government's reason for going to war was weapons of mass destruction, so to send our boys in to fight in tanks that did not have the kit to deal with such weapons seems very irresponsible. Time should be made available to debate that issue and for the Government to make a statement about what will happen, as well as to debate the investigations issue that the hon. Gentleman raised.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Virginia Bottomley) raised castles and conveniences, Mr. Varah's early departure from the probation service and Abbeyfield homes. I should be grateful if the Minister touched on those issues in replying to the debate.

The debate has been wide ranging, touching on subjects of importance in many areas and covering geography as far apart as Sierra Leone, Guatanamo bay and the docklands light railway. It is traditional on these occasions to wish all hon. Members on both sides of the House a very merry and happy Easter recess, and I am happy to do so, especially to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I also thank all the people who do so much in the House of Commons to help Members—all the staff who work here, the Clerks and those who keep us safe.

5.45 pm

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): I start by echoing the final remarks of the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) and thanking, on behalf of all right hon. and hon. Members, the staff who work in this place in many different capacities. It is particularly worth mentioning, given the events that have taken place in the Palace and outside during the Session, the debt of gratitude that we all owe to the security and police forces. They put their lives on the line every day and we struggle to remember to wear our passes. We should put that in perspective.

I echo also the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the nature of these debates. They are extremely wide ranging and it is difficult comprehensively to respond to them. I apologise in advance if I do not do so. However, I undertake to bring to the attention of Ministers the points that have been made where Members have requested that I do so. I know that some of the issues that have been raised have been by letter as well as by parliamentary questions.

The debate has been amazingly wide ranging. I shall start with the important defeat of the Shrimpers. I think that it was 2–0. There was a contest over the first goal. For the sake of balance, I say on behalf of my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) and for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) that I think that it was not offside. Congratulations should be due to all those involved.

Mention was made of football teams in other Members' constituencies, or at least where many supporters of those teams live—namely, Liverpool and Manchester United. It is always a good idea to get in the names of football teams. It is always a good idea also to get in the name of the local newspaper. I congratulate those Members who have done that. I would not be so foolish as to criticise anyone for doing so.

I shall now try to respond to the debate. My hon. Friends the Members for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) and for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) referred to the Richard commission, which reported today. I agree in every aspect with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on the report. It is a report to the National Assembly for Wales and, in the first instance, it is for the Assembly to consider it. The Government will be responding appropriately to the report in future.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has gone on record as saying that he supports the alternative vote system and not the single transferable vote system. The hon. Member for Hornchurch (John Cryer) and others raised points about proportional representation, and I can agree with them in that context.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) talked about some important points that he has taken up with the Ministry of Defence. I know from previous debates and from seeing correspondence that the MOD is aware of his concerns. They will note the points that he has raised during the debate.

The right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Virginia Bottomley) apologised to the House for being unable to remain in her place. She was kind enough to inform me that the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) would take her place, as it were. I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for her courtesy. She raised a number of matters, including some policy issues, and made some requests. She asked me to encourage a reply from the Department for Education and Skills on the next steps on the Farnham castle issue. I shall certainly draw that to the attention of the Department. The right hon. Lady referred to the Surrey Institute of Art and Design students, who had lobbied her. She said that she thought that they would be lobbying her on behalf of student debt. Ironically, I remember 20 years ago lobbying the right hon. Lady when she was the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the then Minister of State, Chris Patten, on the issue of student debt. Perhaps things have come full circle. However, students now are immeasurably better off due to the generosity of Government support. I could go into the figures.

The right hon. Lady said that she was lobbied on behalf of the British Toilet Association. She was pleased, but surprised, to discover that there was such an association. Indeed, there is an all-party group on public toilets, and a valuable service it does. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) is the chairperson—at least, she was when I went to the meetings. Toilets are an important part of public services, and the House will be relieved to hear that I was sorry to learn that the students fear that 50 per cent. of the toilets will be lost as a result of the Disability Discrimination Act. It that is true, it is an example of the law of unintended consequences. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for disabled people, who is doing a fantastic job improving the rights of disabled people, will want to note those points. If that is happening in the constituency of the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey, it could well be happening elsewhere.

The right hon. Lady asked me to raise the matter of Abbeyfield homes with the relevant Minister at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and I am happy to do that. She also raised concerns about the primary care trust. To be fair to her, she acknowledged that her constituents have a growing confidence in the NHS—I believe I quote accurately—and I am glad to hear of her support. She drew attention to difficulties that I assume are local difficulties to do with decisions being taken locally. I shall draw the matter to the attention of the Department of Health.

My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) made one of those interesting speeches that bring a little philosophy, reflection and wisdom to Adjournment debates. I sign up to the idea that what goes around comes around. It is amazing how similar these Adjournment debates are over the many years that they have taken place, if one takes the trouble to read them. I should respond to my hon. Friend's worries about the decline in the powers of local authorities by saying that the examples he gave show that the tide is turning. It is not coming up the beach as quickly as he would like, but the Greater London council has been replaced by the Greater London authority, thanks to the Government's programme. It does not have as many powers as he would like, but I hope he acknowledges that the tide is turning.

The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) raised four issues on behalf of his constituents. I shall begin with the most important—the case of Major Richard Perkins, his constituent. I am advised that the Ministry of Defence is trying to resolve the tax status, following the decision by the Veterans Agency to award him his war disablement pension. I am also advised that the case is not straightforward. The MOD is preparing a submission to the Inland Revenue, which is responsible for the final decision. The MOD acknowledges that it has taken some time to resolve the matter and apologises for the inconvenience that that has caused. I ask the hon. Gentleman to pass that on to his constituent, whom all of us would want to help. An 86-year-old ex-soldier deserves our support.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of livestock farmers in north Yorkshire and the CAP reform. I do not know whether he was present for the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on CAP reform, when she described the process that we would be going through. The definition of severely disadvantaged areas is obviously important. The issue arises in my constituency as well.

Mr. Greenway: Since I made my speech and was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), I have discovered that an announcement by the Minister was expected today, but no announcement has been made.

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for drawing that to our attention. His remarks will be noted.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of flooding. He asked me to pass on the special case of Pickering. Anyone who knows his part of the world will be familiar with the problems. He asked for an extension of the scheme or another device to allow the scheme to be put in place. Again, his remarks will be noted.

Mr. Heald: Would the Minister take this as a representation, which I did not make at business questions? It is necessary for the Secretary of State to make a statement to the House about the changes that she is making to her response to reform of the common agricultural policy. Could we have that statement in the first week back?

Mr. Woolas: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Secretary of State's statement on 12 February was open and transparent. She rightly committed herself to consultations, and that was accepted by both sides of the House, as was the fact that the reform of the subsidies programmes and the definition of the areas require balanced decisions. I can only pass on the hon. Gentleman's request, although I can see his point. I commend the Secretary of State's policy on this important issue. Many have called for the reform of the common agricultural policy for many years. We are delivering on that, and that is important for our farming industry and countryside.

[Mr. Woolas]

The hon. Member for Ryedale also referred to insurance and terrorism. I believe that I am right in saying that he is a former insurance broker, and obviously the lack of insurance in respect of terrorist activities must be tackled. I believe that the Treasury will be looking at that. He asked for a shot in the arm on that point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (John Cryer) raised a number of local points, as well as a general point about the Richard commission. If I was in a position to sign early-day motions, I would certainly sign early-day motion 930, tabled by him and my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer). I think that his 40th birthday is due during the Easter recess, so I wish him a happy birthday from all of us.

My hon. Friend rightly criticised his Conservative-controlled council's cavalier and irresponsible attitude to his primary schools and showed how it was not taking into account the needs of the children in his constituency. He raised, as he has done before, the issue of mobile phone masts, and he raised the issue of the docklands light railway, asking for it to be extended to Rainham. That was a successful private finance initiative that came in on time and on budget, and I will be happy to pass on his request to the Secretary of State for Transport. My hon. Friend made a general point about the Richard commission and proportional representation, to which I have referred, and I think that he knows the views of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on that matter.

The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) took us to the beautiful villages of Devon, where she wants to encourage us to go for our holidays, and I hope that hon. Members will be able to do so. She talked about the vital villages programme. I know that she is aware that the reorganisation of the budget has led to a curtailment of future budgets for that programme and she may like to take that matter up in more detail. I understand the point that she makes. She referred to Gittisham, which I think appeared in the national press recently, and if what happened there occurred in any of our constituencies we would take a similar attitude. She referred to petrol pumps and called for a little common sense, which we hope can be achieved. She talked about horse safety, as she often does, and the need to protect our horses. She is aware that the schemes that have been put in place are intended to do that, but I know that the equine lobby has concerns about their implementation.

The hon. Lady made probably the longest request ever, which was originally intended for the Prime Minister, at what I could perhaps describe as a virtual Prime Minister's Question Time. I would not dare to presume to answer on behalf of the Prime Minister, except to say that I am always amused that the question regarding the EU constitution referendum is never defined. If one were to say that the constitution was a fundamental change from the treaties of Europe, I could see the case for a referendum. But if one reads the proposed constitution, and I have, it does not fundamentally change the treaties, so it is a bit of a bogus argument.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) made some interesting points. I am sorry that I am not able to respond to all hon. Members. I was going to give a positive response on the Croxley rail link. We are waiting for the results of the comprehensive spending review before re-examining that. I answered some of the points made by hon. Members from Essex who have had a huge and record increase in the number of police officers, and everyone knows that crime is falling. I am sorry that I cannot go into further details about the success of the economy under the Government, which I would be more than happy to do, but I end by wishing all hon. Members and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a very happy Easter.

It being Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Transport (Pudsey)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.— [Charlotte Atkins.]

6 pm

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): I want to start by discussing the problems facing the most oppressed minority among public transport users: bus passengers. Since deregulation in 1986, they have faced a consistent and irreversible decline in services, and Pudsey is no exception. The voices of bus passengers are rarely heard, and I want to redress that shortcoming with a few short quotes from my constituents.

The first comes from Laura Ladd of Yeadon, who wrote a cogently argued letter about the shortcomings of First Bus, saying:

"Fares have increased significantly over the past years with no improvement in service. New bus times and numbers were launched with insufficient information and few new timetables made available at stops. I should congratulate you"—

First Bus—

"that buses are rarely late—they just don't arrive at all."

The next quote is from Mr. Stephen Tong, who bemoans the loss of the 66 route in Pudsey and says:

"Whenever I have travelled on this service I have noticed that the vast majority of passengers are elderly, and many of them infirm. The withdrawal of this service would be a body blow to the many small communities which it serves."

Mrs. D. Burke says, among many other comments that "When I came here to live in 1988 I drove a car and was a much younger person. Now I am in my eighties, my eyesight is not good enough to drive and I depend solely on public transport, which is an absolute shambles."

Another constituent, Alan Gladwell, comments on the same theme that

"In Leeds, the concentration seems to be on the more popular (and more profitable) routes in and out of the city centre. It seems to be a common occurrence for First or other monopolistic bus service providers to withdraw bus services for 'commercial reasons'."

Mrs. Margaret Young of Yeadon wrote to me about the loss of a link between her part of Yeadon and Otley, which is the location of Wharfedale General hospital, noting:

"It would seem that whoever it is that decides on these 'silly' changes never travels by bus, has never understood the geography of the area of Lower Yeadon and perhaps doesn't even know there is a Hospital at Otley (the wonderful Wharfedale Hospital) that caters for Yeadon."

Dennis Gibbons bemoans the changes, saying:

"As a daily user of the bus services in Leeds we see the decline in the provision of local services at first hand . . . They continue to alter and change services with inadequate notice and with little thought to the users of those services."

Finally, in a cogently argued three-page critique of the operation of First Bus, my constituent Anne Simms says:

"I enjoy my job and once upon a time I used to enjoy travelling to and from work. Sadly though now I do not enjoy the travelling at all because of the fact that buses are late or missing and I have such problems getting home."

Since the deregulation of the bus industry outside London in 1986, bus use has declined by nearly 30 per cent., and fares have risen by more than 25 per cent. in real terms. Outside London, the Government are in real danger of missing their 10-year plan target for increasing bus use. A recent parliamentary answer indicated that although bus patronage grew by 3.8 per cent. nationally in the past two years for which figures are available, the growth in London was 13.5 per cent.; outside London it was minus 1.8 per cent.

Two thirds of public transport journeys are made by bus. Those on the lowest 20 per cent. of incomes make more than nine out of 10 of their public transport journeys by bus, and about 60 per cent. of bus journeys are made by people from households who do not own a car. People on low incomes outside London are particularly badly affected, with fares rising by 2.1 per cent. a year in real terms over the past 10 years.

Marginal social routes continue to be vulnerable to cutbacks, as the letters that I have quoted from constituents attest. Arriva's most recent half-year report spells it out. It states:

"Outside London our approach, to what is currently a mature market, is to focus on a twin track strategy of targeting investment to deliver growth and eliminating low margin and loss-making routes."

In London, the average pre-tax profit margins of such companies are under 6 per cent.; in passenger transport executive—PTE—areas such as mine in west Yorkshire, the average is 14 per cent.

In areas such as Pudsey, 5 to 10 per cent. of services do not operate, and even when they do, punctuality is poor. According to PTE figures that I have just received, punctuality in the Pudsey area fell below the so-called acceptable level of 95 per cent. in every single month since June 2003, and it has fallen as low as 80 per cent. on some occasions. PTEs are involved in planning services effectively only at the margin, since 85 per cent. of services are commercial. PTEs continue to try to get the best out of the existing system. For example, locally we have the Yorkshire bus initiative, guided bus projects and a major bus priority measure on the A65 that will serve a small part of my constituency, but such measures are severely limited.

It is clear that overall the current structure is failing passengers. It is time for a fresh approach to the way in which we spend the £1.3 billion public subsidy that goes into bus services. My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware of early-day motion 581 on bus franchising. My view, and that of those MPs who support it, is that if it is good enough for London, it is good enough for my constituents—and, I hasten to add, my hon. Friend's constituents.

Legislation to allow PTEs and local authorities to introduce London-style bus franchising through quality contracts is long overdue. Although such contracts are possible, the hurdles are so high that, according to a recent parliamentary answer, none has been introduced. The system is being reviewed and there is some indication that the period between which an application is made and comes into operation is being considered, but, on the good authority of the PTE in my area, that will not change the system in practice.

We need to make it easier for local authorities and PTEs to introduce quality contracts where the private sector is failing to provide an integrated, socially inclusive service delivered in a way that achieves passenger growth in areas outside London. Bus services could be planned to connect with—rather than to compete against—train, tram and light rail services, and there could be tickets that increased transfer between buses and other means of travel.

Like bus passengers, rail users in my constituency have been ill served by privatisation. My constituency is served by stations on three routes—Horsforth, New Pudsey and Guiseley. I accept that we have seen some major improvements. All three stations have undergone major refurbishment. The efficiency of Leeds City station has been increased by a £250 million investment that has reduced congestion and delays. An RPP—rail passenger partnership—grant enabled the provision of excellent new 333 class four-car rolling stock on the Airedale and Wharfedale line. I should declare an interest, because I am an avid user of those trains.

Between 1994 and 2000, use of the west Yorkshire rail network increased by 44 per cent. from 11.5 million to 16.6 million passengers. The privatised structure simply has not coped with that increase in demand and use. The recent inquiry by the Select Committee on Transport into overcrowding on public transport concluded that overcrowding is worse in west Yorkshire than in the south-east. Overcrowding in London and south-east in the morning peak is 5 per cent., while in west Yorkshire it is 9 per cent. in the morning peak and 5.3 per cent. in the evening peak. For example, four of the six trains arriving in Leeds via New Pudsey between 7.30 am and 9 am have standing passengers. In the evening peak, five of the six services leaving Leeds between 4.30 pm and 6 pm have standing passengers. We must tackle that sardine syndrome in areas such as west Yorkshire.

Additional units are required to cater for future growth, especially to serve the two priority new stations sites identified on the Wharfedale line—Apperley Bridge and Kirkstall. Metro has bid for six additional units, three of which would operate on that line, but several outstanding issues need to be resolved before the bid can succeed. It is essential for a way forward to be found if future growth and new stations are to be accommodated. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues will do everything that they can to ensure that the current impasse is resolved favourably.

The capacity issues are also the key to other priority plans, such as the Horsforth Woodside station that is planned for my constituency. There is a longer list of 30 possible stations that includes Calverley Rodley. That is also in my constituency and would provide an excellent site for a park and ride scheme.

Unfortunately, the high cost of rolling stock means that it difficult to provide the extra trains required. For example, it costs £144,000 to lease a two-car basic Pacer train from a rolling stock company. By comparison, the cost to Metro when it bought a two-car Pacer was £350,000. Those figures show that there is a huge rate of return, so it is not surprising that both HSBC and the Angel Trains leasing company make £1 million a week in after-tax profits.

West Yorkshire Metro has a blueprint for increasing patronage by more than 50 per cent. over the next 10 years. That involves lengthening existing trains by procuring additional rolling stock and lengthening platforms. It will not require a great deal of infrastructure investment. Indeed, that growth, impressive though it would be, could be achieved with a relatively modest investment of between £5 million and £6 million per annum over 10 years.

While I am on the subject of rail, it would be remiss of me not to make passing reference to the Leeds supertram proposals, which obviously have wide-ranging implications for the city of Leeds, West Yorkshire and my constituents because the scheme would provide a public transport alternative to the private car. As part of the wider long-term development of supertram, a route between Leeds and Bradford—via my Pudsey constituency—is emerging as one of the better performing possible routes that could be added to the core system, if that went ahead. I appreciate that supertram proposals are being reassessed in the light of substantial cost increases, but its partners are preparing options—including reduced ones within the figures agreed in 2001—that are still favourable compared with alternative forms of transport. I implore my hon. Friend the Minister and the Secretary of State to meet Leeds Members, supertram partners and representatives of the business community to discuss the revised submissions because they are incredibly important for Leeds and West Yorkshire.

Let me turn to the impact of air transport on my constituency, with particular reference to Leeds Bradford airport. The Secretary of State's White Paper statement recognised the need for a balance between growth in air travel and its environmental impact on not only climate change, but those living near airports, such as my constituents. He confirmed that we needed to reduce and minimise the impact of airports on local communities and the natural environment.

The White Paper section on Leeds Bradford airport also refers to the need to minimise noise impact and improve public transport and access. It refers to an "airport master plan". The executive summary on page 11 makes reference to airport operators developing "appropriate access plans". Will the Government be issuing clear guidance on what the "airport master plans" or "access plans" might actually contain?

It is clear from the local debate on the White Paper and the consultation that preceded it that the airport consultative committee is not considered as an adequate mechanism for providing continuing dialogue between local residents and the airport. However, that in no way decries the energetic and laudable efforts that the airport's director and management team have made to engage in the local debate generated by the consultation process leading up to the White Paper. They also spend significant time trying to deal with the day-to-day concerns of local residents, but that is invariably ad hoc and reactive.

We need an airport planning process that is based on proper formal public consultation. That should be underpinned by an independent environmental impact assessment, which should include consideration of the impact, prevention and minimisation of air and noise pollution, climate change, and other associated issues, such as operating hours. At the moment, the only time that public consultation takes place is when a planning application is submitted for a specific development, which is usually something like a car park or runway extension, but such a piecemeal approach is totally inadequate. It also prompts a question about the local authority determining planning applications for an airport in which it has a clear interest.

If anyone were looking for an airport site today, the location of Leeds Bradford airport would be unlikely to feature in the process. Its limitations must properly be reflected in future plans. Even at current passenger levels, there is a need for improvement to road safety and access. Transport links are poor and the roads are widely regarded as inadequate and unsafe. The implications of growth cannot be addressed without consideration of the impact on local communities and the environment.

I appreciate that people in Leeds and West Yorkshire want to fly from their airport at the cheapest price to the greatest number of destinations. Although my constituents who live near the airport realise that there is a price to pay for the location, they rightly do not want their quality of life destroyed over time by its unrestricted and excessive growth. A fair and sustainable balance must be struck.

The condition of roads is the final issue that I wish to tackle in the whistle-stop tour of transport issues in Pudsey. Like other constituencies in Leeds, mine suffers from a substantial backlog in highway maintenance. That occurred in the years of the Conservative Government when inadequate capital allocations caused difficult compromises. Leeds city council chose to prioritise schools, early years provision and social services, especially services for older people, at the expense of highways.

Although I am pleased that the council has earmarked an extra £15 million for highways over the next three years, its ability to make even more progress depends on the highways formula spending share. Besides maintenance, there are other important aspects such as road safety measures, crossings and speed cameras.

The council's grant was affected when the A1-M1 link was opened. The link obviously led to a reduction in traffic flows on some major routes, but they were never designed to take the traffic that they experienced before the link was opened. Consequently, they needed major repair. The traffic has gone and the money has gone with it, but the maintenance is still required.

The removal of the traffic flow threshold had an impact on Leeds. Previously, average traffic flow had to be above a specified figure before councils received any extra money. Removing the threshold spread the money across a greater number of authorities, to the obvious detriment of areas such as Leeds.

I am aware of the clock, and, given the constraints of time and the need to give my hon. Friend the Minister some time to respond, I shall bring the tour to an end. I anticipate his response with bated breath and I know that he will write to me about any of the issues that he is unable to cover in the remaining 13 minutes.

6.17 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) on securing the debate and raising the issue of transport in and around Pudsey. Indeed, if all hon. Members were as vigilant as he on transport, the various responsible agencies and authorities would have to sit up and take a bit more notice than they sometimes do. It is right and proper for him to quote his constituents, who depend on and use the buses and trains.

I ask my hon. Friend to understand that some great improvements have taken place. We have great hopes for the outcome of the rail review, because we are currently spending huge amounts of money on the railways and we want to get much more value for taxpayers' precious money. Our strategy is to tackle congestion and pollution by improving all sorts of transport. My hon. Friend used the word "integrated". It is mightily overused and its application to transport is often vague. We need much more integration and we should think about it much more strategically than we often do, at all levels of government.

We are interested in some of the issues that my hon. Friend raised. We want to establish a strategy for investment to create prosperity and a better environment, as well as to do all the things for his constituents that my hon. Friend mentioned earlier.

The step change in funding that we have made over the past four years emphasises the Government's commitment to delivering a sustained improvement to the transport infrastructure and thus a real improvement to people's daily lives. The total capital funding available for authorities' local transport plans in 2004–05 is £1.9 billion. That is a huge amount of money, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that, with that amount of money available, bus services should not be deteriorating but improving—as indeed they are in some parts of the country.

In Pudsey, a share of that sum of almost £2 billion will be delivered through the West Yorkshire local transport plan. LTPs have provided more certainty of funding for local authorities, with almost a doubling of funding in investment to improve road safety, to increase the capacity and use of public transport, and to reduce the backlog of road and bridge maintenance. My hon. Friend was right to mention that issue; it is a shame how far road maintenance programmes were cut back during those long years of Tory Government. Neither the Tories nor many others understood the importance of maintaining our roads in good condition, and we are now having to pay much more as a result.

The burden of my hon. Friend's concerns related to buses. A key area for an authority's LTP is to increase the use of public transport and to improve the service to users. The sustained development of bus services is key to this. When I was growing up in the 1950s, every developing country wanted a steelworks and a state airline. Nowadays, every city and large town in this kingdom seems to want a tram system or light rail system. They are, however, enormously expensive. We have met MPs from Leeds, and my hon. Friend is right to say that there is a visionary project for a tram system there, but its cost has doubled over a very short period. The last costing that I saw was £1 billion, which is a huge amount of taxpayers' money to spend on such a project.

I shall be interested to see what we can do to improve the image of buses and bus travel, and the quality of bus transport. It is very much the Cinderella service, although buses carry just as many people as the railways do. They are very flexible, and if they are run properly, they can and do provide a real quality service around the country. One of the problems is that we assume that there is a golden bullet that will cut through all the difficulties involved in making bus transport more popular. I do not think that such a golden bullet exists. It is down to good management, a committed work force, paying people decent rates of pay and making them feel as though they are part of a valuable service. That is the kind of ethos that the best of the railway companies have developed over the years. There is no reason why bus services should not be like that.

Mr. Truswell: Is not part of the problem the fact that where there are improvements to bus services, they tend to be on the profitable commercial routes? Under the pre-1986 system, that "profit" would have been used to cross-subsidise the unprofitable services that were necessarily very important to those without cars who depend on buses for their transport. That cross-subsidy no longer occurs, because any profit simply goes to pay shareholders.

Dr. Howells: That is partly true, but not entirely so. I have seen for myself bus services in rural areas of England, for example, that are developing interesting dial-up systems and flexible routes that can respond to the needs of people living in remote areas who do not have cars and who depend on buses. The notion of integration, which he mentioned earlier, can often be key. It is about trying to understand exactly what people need in those areas and how the bus service can best respond to those needs. My hon. Friend is right that in many ways flexibility has decreased as a consequence of what has happened over the past 10 or 20 years. I was in Carnforth in Lancashire recently, for example, where I saw an excellent scheme operating from Carnforth railway station, with proper integration, and a real sense of wanting to respond to the special needs of people who may live in remote areas, or who may live in inner city areas, who perhaps cannot afford cars or do not want cars and want to use public transport. Of course, there is an issue of affordability, but there is also an issue of good management, to which we have not paid enough attention.

May I add that that is also a big issue on the railways? I was lucky enough to go to Japan recently and see the Japanese railways, which have huge capacity. I have been going round boasting that last year we carried 1 billion people on the railways in Britain, which is the highest total since 1961. The Japanese railways carried 21.7 billion people. They do it not through space age technology or rocket science but through very good management and responding to what passengers need. They charge a premium fare for it, by the way, but people are prepared to pay those fares if they know that they will get a very good service as a consequence. That is a target at which we must aim in this country, whether in Pudsey or anywhere else.

My hon. Friend was particularly concerned about the question of future funding. Public transport subsidy in West Yorkshire was £66 million last year. If we divide that total by all the trips taken in West Yorkshire by passengers, it works out at about £3 subsidy per passenger journey. That is a big subsidy. It is not quite as big as the overall subsidy for passengers in Britain, by the way, which is a bit nearer £4 per passenger journey. It is a big slug of public investment. We must examine that carefully in relation to schemes that look very attractive, and my hon. Friend is right to have identified some of those in his area. We need to consider how we can improve on the way in which we use new vehicles on railways, and how to improve signalling systems so that we use more intensively the railways that are already there. Network Rail, the Strategic Rail Authority and some of the rail companies are looking closely at that and doing sterling work to try to improve performance. I hope that he will welcome that.

My hon. Friend mentioned briefly the ROSCOs—rolling stock companies—and the profits that they have been making. It is a remarkable story. There has been investment of £4 billion in 4,000 new carriages for our railways over the last seven years. That is the biggest order that has ever been placed, and it is hard to see how that could have been public investment alone—public-private investment was needed to get that sea change. As for the average age of our fleet, it is now one of the youngest anywhere in Europe, with more and more new trains coming on to the system, and the system will improve as a consequence.

My hon. Friend asked about the aviation White Paper master plan. Yes, I can give him an absolute assurance that the Department will issue guidance for airports on the production of master plans. On the question of surface access, he noted the quality of transport links to Leeds Bradford airport. Once again, I refer him to the aviation White Paper, which on page 143 states:

"responsibility for bringing forward proposals and securing funding lies with airport operators, working closely with DfT, SRA, HA and regional and local bodies".

It also notes—

Farming

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Vernon Coaker.]

9.30 am

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I am pleased to have the opportunity to debate the financial future of farming. I do not want to be unduly churlish, but the recent reforms of the common agricultural policy are among the most significant changes for farming since the last war. It is therefore a pity that we are debating the subject in Westminster Hall and not having a full-scale debate on the Floor of the House. Some hon. Members will recall that it was the practice to have regular debates on agriculture, but my memory suggests that we have not had a proper debate on the subject for a long time. Although I am grateful for today's debate, it is still the second-best option. Farming in Great Britain deserves more than 90 minutes in Westminster Hall.

The debate gives hon. Members the opportunity to raise some of the concerns arising out of the Government's decision to decouple subsidies in line with the mid-term reform of CAP. Farmers' income has increased during the past few years. In the past year, it has risen from an average of about £11,000 a year to approximately £15,000, but that is still a small amount of money. The farming industry may be only a small part of the British economy, but it is none the less important. Most people believe that the landscape that they so cherish is looked after by farmers; the role of farmers is thus far more important than the simple economic strength of their industry. That is why anything that damages the farming industry should be viewed with great concern by the British people and the Government.

One problem that farmers face is uncertainty. They have lived with it for years—it is part of a farmer's life when it comes to the weather, climate and so on. However, the financial uncertainty that has been with them for years seems to be getting worse. The mid-term reform of CAP means that we now know, in rough terms, what is going to happen to subsidies in Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and England. However, farmers cannot look at their books and say what their income is likely to be, or what sort of subsidy they are likely to receive. Indicative of that is the fact that, at a meeting of senior members of the Scottish agriculture department, a senior official who was asked for an estimate of farming incomes in a few years' time replied, "I don't know."

Farmers need certainty. They need to know where they are going. Farming is a hugely capital-intensive business, not only because of land prices but because of the costs of long-term investment. Farmers cannot predict the future, but if they do not have a reasonable idea of where they might be in four or five years, it becomes ever harder to make investment decisions.

Dairy farmers are under the greatest pressure. The other day, they were told in no uncertain terms that unless they could reduce their production costs to below 18p a litre, they might as well pack up and go home. It is no doubt true that at least 60 per cent. of milk produced in England is sold at a loss. The reason why so many dairy farmers seem to survive against all the odds is that many dairy farms are family-run; but they seem to live on air, not money. It is because the family pitches in that farms can continue, but they had a blunt warning that if they could not reduce their costs they would go out of business—or be forced to take up another form of agriculture. That is a crucial decision for farmers. Some families, particularly those in my constituency in Northumberland, have been dairy farming for years. They are now having to consider whether to continue or join the many who have already left the industry.

I shall concentrate on one sector that has been seriously affected by the Government's decision to introduce a two-tier system of single farm payments in England: farmers in upland areas. Many in Northumberland are likely to be seriously affected by the Government's decision that there should be two payment areas—those where the land is classified as severely disadvantaged, and the rest, so to speak. The majority of hill farmers in Northumberland, the north Pennines, the Lake district, the Peak district—where the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) is—Exmoor, Dartmoor and the Welsh borders will be hugely affected.

Just over 300 farmers attended a meeting that took place at Hexham auction mart a week ago. That suggests how much worry, and what strength of feeling, the decision not to pay a full rate of subsidy in those severely disadvantaged areas has caused among those farmers.

There seems to be a misunderstanding about what is happening up in the hills. About 30 years ago the Government gave farmers a substantial grant to reclaim moorland and rough grazing. Those farmers did so, on a large scale. In areas that were categorised as severely disadvantaged 30 years ago, there has been substantial improvement in the way that the land has been brought into pasture and grazing, and looked after.

It is paradoxical that for years farmers were given money to remove heather moorland and white grass rough grazing and convert it to productive grassland, but now they are being given grant money to return it to the state of unproductive grassland and heather. In my constituency there is an experimental farm, which led the way in reclaiming rough grazing for good pasture. When the Government policy changed, the principal resigned, because having spent 30 years teaching everyone how to recover such land, he could not face the idea of having to tell people how to return it to the way it used to be.

The long and the short of it is that many acres in the SDAs are typical grassland. One farmer in my constituency has 50 acres of arable land, which he ploughs regularly, in the SDA. The impact of the decision will be marked. Farmers in upland areas will experience a substantial reduction in their income as the single farm payment switches from the historical basis to the area payment basis over the next eight years.

By way of example, one farmer in my constituency, whom I shall not name, has calculated that his total payment in subsidies, which is now £30,927 a year, will diminish to £14,625 during the eight-year transition period. His cumulative loss will amount to £78,440. In contrast, his neighbour, on the other side, has an upland farm that to all appearances is just the same as my constituent's, but that is outside the SDA line. That line on the map means that the farmer next door will gain £66,000 over the eight years. That will cause problems for the farmers affected.

Problems arise in many ways. The upland farmers—certainly in Northumberland—have tended to be specialists in high-quality livestock. They breed top-quality lambs that sell for substantial prices in sales of breeding stock, as well as top-quality cattle. To maintain that high standard new stock must be brought in, but to improve a flock or herd, top-quality replacements must be bought in. Therefore there is competition between farmers at the auction marts for such stock. How will a farmer who has lost £78,440 compete with a farmer who has gained £66,483? The answer is that the farmer in the SDA, who relies on buying good-quality stock, will have to face being outbid by his neighbour who is in a better position to afford it.

There will be other knock-on effects. My constituency in Northumberland lies on the Scottish border. In Scotland the historical system has been adopted throughout—a fixed amount. Farmers on the Scottish side will have vastly more than their neighbours on the English side. That will apply to farmers in Wales, too. Those in the borders and the marches will be in the same predicament. One farmer will be disadvantaged in comparison to another, simply because of a geographical spread.

The decision will have an environmental impact. Many environmental organisations are deeply concerned about its impact on the look of the hills. When I met farmers the other day to talk about the matter, one of the things that they, and especially a big beef producer, said was, "If this happens, I will not be able to afford to maintain a suckler cow herd. I will simply have to sell it off and go into the business of ranching sheep. That is low cost, and would allow me to lose the man that I employ and simply run a large sheep ranch on my own and my son's labour."

Taking the cattle off the hills will change the environment because those who understand such things know that sheep graze one particular type of ground in a different way from cattle. In order to maintain the environment that we like so much in our upland areas, we need that variety of grazing. That will go and the environmental cost will be serious, not only for the appearance of the land but for wildlife. Ungrazed land in the upland areas soon becomes infested with things such as ticks. That will have a profound effect on some of the birds and animals that live there.

I pray in aid a letter that has been given to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), whose constituency is hugely affected by the proposal but who is sadly unable to be here today. He received a letter from the chief executive of the North York Moors national park authority, and it is worth quoting a paragraph from it as it encapsulates the environmental concerns that the change has prompted. The chief executive writes:

"The detail of the proposed payments does however bring with it some severe consequences for the National Park. The core of the National Park is Severely Disadvantaged Area and this land is due to receive a much lower rate of payment per hectare than the rest of the country. Not only does the Severely Disadvantaged Area encompass moorland, it also includes almost the entirety of the famous Dales of the Park such as Farndale, Fryup Dale, Bransdale, Rosedale etc plus large parts of Bilsdale and other Dales. As you know, these Dales are stunningly beautiful and they contain relatively large numbers of fairly small farms."

That at least identifies those farmers who will be hugely disadvantaged. The land is worked much more intensely than moorland. Consequently, current public subsidy is much higher than for moorland areas because the productivity is high enough.

I know Farndale quite well, because it happens to belong to a constituent of mine. It is one of the most beautiful valleys in that part of Yorkshire. The small farms do much to add to the appearance of a very attractive dale. If we knock the economic heart out of those communities, the future for the appearance of Farndale and the other dales, in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire, will be bleak.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will my hon. Friend also take time to point out that farming on some of the smaller farms, in smaller fields, with the restrictions that they have, can be much more expensive and intensive for the farmer and farm labour than in some large arable areas, which will be included in the general payment scheme? Far from helping the countryside and the agri-rural environment, as the Government say that they want to, the proposals could greatly damage the smaller farms that we often find in that part of the country.

Mr. Atkinson: Precisely. That is exactly the problem. To make a gentle political point, it is slightly perverse that a Labour Government should seek to deprive the small, hard-working farmers whom my hon. Friend has just mentioned and to reward large grouse moor owners, such as those in my constituency and in the north Pennines. I am a great grouse-shooting enthusiast. I believe that it greatly benefits the countryside, preserves the heather moor and adds a lot to the local economy. However, I am not quite happy with the idea that an Arab prince who owns a very good moor in my constituency should receive the substantial additional payment, while the hard-working farmer that my hon. Friend has mentioned suffers. That seems perverse from a Labour Government.

There is an economic problem too, because such farms employ labour. Some of the bigger farms in my constituency employ labour directly, but the smaller farms employ people to do particular jobs. That makes an important contribution to the local economy. The money is spent in local agricultural merchants and shops. Such farmers tend to be isolated so they usually spend more money in the local community rather than drive to the nearest town for their shopping. Removing the money will seriously disadvantage that economy.

Excluding farms in the SDAs from the full subsidy will be especially damaging. I do not understand why the particular boundary line was chosen. It is a line on a map that is seriously outdated because, as I mentioned earlier, much of the land has been improved. Surely a much better way of categorising the land would be to adopt what is known as the moorland line, which is used for many other purposes and defines what most ordinary people would call moorland—heather or white grass—differentiating it from cultivated land. That would seem a much more sensible arrangement.

There have been suggestions that the affected farmers could be compensated through much higher rates of environmental payments to counter their loss in the single farm payment. That is not a solution. Although environmental payments could give more money to those farmers, they would not remove uncertainty because they can vary and depend on adjusting farming activities to meet their criteria. Sir Donald Curry, who was responsible for the Curry commission, is a constituent of mine, and knows well the problems faced by the SDA farmer. He said that giving extra money for environmental schemes is not an answer.

I urge the Government to go back to the drawing board. Like me, most farmers believe that their choice of a high-rate scheme was right. There was much criticism of that, but in the long term it is better than going for the historical scheme. The historical scheme may suit Wales or Scotland—I do not wish to enter a debate on that—but, given two difficult options, it was right to choose an area payment scheme. Ultimately, it will free farmers to be much more responsive to the market. However, it would be wrong to act over the bodies of many hundreds of hard-working farmers in the upland areas who look after the landscape that the British people most appreciate. I urge Ministers to reconsider.

9.47 am

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on securing the debate. As he rightly said at the outset, there have not been as many debates on farming in recent times as there were when I first came to the House. That may be encouraging in some ways, in the sense that the more debates there are, the worse the state of the industry is. There is some indication that its state has improved a little during the past two or three years.

I often think that farming is somewhat similar to a slow-moving rollercoaster, except that the downs seem much steeper and more protracted than the ups. Farming is a unique industry in many ways, in that it is subject not only to economic trends but to disease, taste, fashion and, most of all, weather. These days, it is also subject to environmental concerns. In many ways, being a farmer is like operating an agricultural fruit machine—all the elements have to be up at the same time to have a successful business. There are not many times in our history when that has been so.

Governments have always been concerned about the uncertainty in farming. My knowledge of Roman history is not sufficient to say whether Romans tried to protect agriculture, but I suspect that they did. Certainly, within the past 150 to 200 years, there have been various schemes of Government intervention to protect and secure stability for farming. The Conservative party will be painfully aware of the corn laws and their abolition, which damaged the party so much and provided such success for its greatest leader, Mr. Disraeli. That showed that there is always a conflict. On the one hand, one wishes to protect, promote and secure certainty for farmers, but on the other there are manufacturers and consumers who want cheap food. That conflict is sometimes difficult to resolve.

Modern times have made things worse for the farmer, although listening to farmers, it can seem as if nothing makes things better. The coming of the steamship made the situation worse, as it brought in food from competing overseas countries that had better climates than ours. Refrigeration must have been one of the biggest curses of all. It allowed meat to be imported from the other side of the world in competition with that which was slaughtered at the bottom of the lane.

Farming prosperity has not always, if ever, been associated with national prosperity. There have been periods, such as the 1920s, when the country as a whole was doing relatively well but farming was doing badly, while in the 1930s, the country and farming were both doing very badly. It was only with the second world war and the Labour Government after it that a serious attempt was made, with the introduction of national subsidies, to provide stability and prosperity for farming. Anyone who has been in politics for a little while will have heard the story of the Norfolk farmer who in 1948 applied to join his local Conservative club. The secretary told him that he had to be a Conservative, and the farmer replied that he had always been a Conservative. The secretary then asked, "Well, why haven't you applied to join before?" to which the farmer said, "It's only since the blessed socialists have been in that I can afford the membership fees."

After the war, farming entered a period in which the Government were concerned about its future and were keen to help, not only for the industry but for national security as they believed that the country needed to produce a large part of its own food. From the 1940s until recent times, with one or two exceptions, farming has been much more prosperous than before. As national subsidies were replaced by the Common Market and the common agricultural policy, the subsidy element remained, although it started to produce problems for farmers and consumers. As we know, all newspapers—not just the tabloids—like to mention wine lakes, butter mountains and all the other things that they, in a facile way, see as the consequences of intervention. However, one wonders how much of our farming industry would still exist without that intervention, subsidy and support.

During the past few years, we have seen a particularly unpleasant depression in agriculture. I cannot speak with any authority on grouse shooting, as it is not a sport that is greatly followed in Essex, as the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) can confirm, but diversification is one way that farmers have been urged to go forward. However, there is a limit to diversification, and I sympathise with the hon. Member for Hexham. His farmers may not be able to diversify as readily as those who are situated close to large urban areas.

Farmers have also been urged to follow niche markets, and a farmer in my constituency has successfully gone into ice cream manufacture from being a dairy farmer. She has done well and is an example of a farmer successfully finding a niche market and diversifying. However, there is a limit to that, because they would not be niche markets if everyone took part in them. However much we may promote diversification and niche markets, we must be aware that agriculture is dependent on livestock and the growing of crops.

From the mid-1990s, and certainly from 1998 onwards, all sectors were in depression, which is more common than it used to be. When farms were more frequently mixed, if one sector was depressed, farmers could move to another sector that was not depressed. However, the mixed-farm principle has fallen by the wayside, so the opportunity to move does not exist, and when all sectors are depressed, it is impossible to move.

When I spoke to pig farmers in my constituency in 1998, they told me that the price that they received was about 55p per kilo, while the break-even price was 90p, so they were making a loss on every pig that they produced. Although those who stayed in production are now making more than 100p—more than the break-even price—the goalposts have moved, as they so often do. A rise in prosperity elsewhere has led to a rise in the price that pig farmers pay for feed—one sector's prosperity has cut the other's profit margins.

None the less, it is good to see improvements. Even three years ago, the price of grain was way below break-even price, but it is now profitable again. Several factors are behind that: some are climatic, some relate to the position of our competitors, but all are variable. As the hon. Member for Hexham said, the fact that the factors involved continually change makes it difficult for farmers to plan for a long-term future.

The new scheme has now been unveiled, and I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is a general welcome in England for its broad-brush approach. However, there are questions about the details and about how the scheme is applied. I am in no position to comment on hill farmers' problems, although my parents lived in a hill farming area for several years. Whenever I visited, I dreaded going to the chapel with them on a Sunday afternoon, because the congregation consisted of hill farmers, who would invariably give me a terribly hard time. They thought that if it rained too much, it was bound to be the Government's fault, but that if it did not rain at all, it was also the Government's fault. None the less, I fully understand the problems that such farmers have faced, and the addition of foot and mouth, which was particularly prevalent in hill country and in the west country, brought devastation to them.

I think that I understand how the new scheme works, although anyone who attempts to examine economic and agricultural matters probably needs a PhD and at least five years at university. Indeed, the language involved would probably qualify as a second language in any school of linguistics. As I understand the scheme, however, we essentially end up with a lump-sum payment. Two elements are involved. One is historical, and I understand why it has been rejected. I remember from my schoolboy A-level history that one reason for Spain's decline was that its procedures were frozen so much that there could be no innovation. If the payment had been fixed to reflect what happened in the two years at the beginning of this century, those who were debating the formula halfway through the century could well have some questions about that. There can also be an element of artificiality as regards how one gets to the position when those years come in. The Government were therefore right to have the balance scheme followed by the tapering, so that the historical element will disappear over time.

The question is what follows from that. Once we say that we are paying not for production but for the guardianship and use of land, certain matters arise. I therefore have one or two questions for my right hon. Friend the Minister. What, for example, will happen to historically unsubsidised sectors? Pig breeding is historically an unsubsidised sector, but is there not a case for those who breed pigs on open land to look for payments? There is a range of non-subsidised sectors, such as fruit growing. Given the principle behind the scheme, are such sectors also to receive payments?

How can the scheme be adapted to encourage new entrants into agriculture? Some elements of the scheme remind me slightly of milk quotas, and there is obviously a financial value to farmers in passing on land that incurs payments. We need to think about how to attract new people into agriculture. Indeed, that is one of the major difficulties that we face. The average age of farmers is higher than the average age of Members of Parliament—it is an ageing profession.

Then we must consider the price of land. Have we considered the effect that the scheme will have on the price of agricultural land? In many ways, agricultural land is an artificial commodity; it is almost a mirage—I should not say that lest there is a land crash. A farmer could earn as little as £15,000 a year from 300 acres, which is an absurdly low figure. Farmers must either have the most astute accountants in the land or must be working for below the minimum wage. For a farmer, an income of £15,000 a year from 300 acres is not a good return on the land. Logically, the price of the land should be much lower, and if we worked out the cost of renting land at an economic price, I do not know how many farming businesses could make a profit.

A further question for the Minister to consider is that of cross-compliance. What connection is there between the environmental schemes that operate and on which payments will ultimately be conditional? What schemes will there be and what level of compliance will be required? Will existing environmental schemes continue or will they be merged into one overall scheme? Will additional payments be made if farmers go beyond the standard level of compliance with environmental regulations? What will be the level of inspection for compliance with environmental demands? Will it be a burdensome or a relatively relaxed regime? Will the regime make farmers feel like they are in partnership with the Government, or will they feel at odds with inspectors?

That brings us on to a matter that is always raised: what will happen about our competitors? Farming does not operate in a vacuum or, to use a jargon phrase, in a national envelope; it competes internationally. Will we operate on the same terms as our competitors? Will our competitors give environmental subsidies for compliance with environmental requirements? I hope that the Minister will reply to those questions.

Let me return to the unsubsidised sector of pigs. The Government have introduced helpful initiatives, for example the home-sourcing initiative through which allowance is made when offering contracts for the benefit to the local community and production standards. Will that be more widely and strongly encouraged? Will greater attempts be made to stimulate proper, effective labelling of products so that we know what we are buying?

I generally welcome the approach that the Government have taken, but we need more flesh on the bones so that it is clear in what direction we are going. The Government, and all parties, are mindful of the difficulties that farmers have endured over a long time, and we are pleased that times are better now than only a little while ago. I look forward to hearing the Minister's replies to my tentative questions.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. Back-Bench Members who want to contribute might wish to know that Front-Bench contributions should start no later than 10.30 am.

10.4 am

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on securing this timely debate. It is timely because of growing concerns, especially in severely disadvantaged areas, on which I want to concentrate this morning. It cannot be emphasised too often that our countryside exists because of our farmers. They have looked after it from generation to generation and from season to season.

One of the reasons why so many millions of people visit my constituency in the Peak district is to enjoy the beautiful countryside that generation after generation of farmers has bequeathed to us. That can be neither emphasised nor repeated often enough. Too often we take the countryside for granted and imagine that it is beautiful because nature has made it so. However, the countryside is as it is because it has been maintained and farmed. One need only look at barren land that has not been looked after for a few seasons to realise that if the countryside and our national parks were not cared for, they would not be the attractive places that millions upon millions of people from different parts of the country visit every weekend. That is why I should like to concentrate on the Government's proposals for the SDAs.

It is essential that the Government get the policy right. I would like to believe that they have made a genuine and honest mistake, perhaps through misunderstanding the difference between disadvantaged areas and severely disadvantaged areas and the moorland line. The Government have made a mistake in their definition. The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) said that the issue is complicated and I have no doubt about that. Indeed, one of my constituents wrote a letter to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to ask how the SDAs first came up. He received quite a long reply from someone working at the uplands land management branch on Horseferry road, from which it is worth quoting. The letter said:

> "I understand that the present SDA line dates back to early the 1960s. It was then called the Hill Cow Line. Farmers within this were eligible for hill farming subsidy payments and capital grants"— as my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham said. The letter continues:

> "The subsidy system started much earlier than this in the late 1940s but was paid, I believe on the breed of livestock rather than within a specific hill area."

I shall not read the entire letter, but it goes on:

> "In 1984 the EC changed the criteria for LFA designation and the UK reviewed the line. The new criteria included 'agricultural disadvantage' and rural areas of less than a certain population density and danger of depopulation. It was at this time that the LFA was split into Severely Disadvantaged and Disadvantaged land. The land bordering the existing LFA, now called SDA was assessed. The criteria being that it was eligible for LFA if it was suitable predominantly for suckler cow and hardy sheep rearing. Arable areas could be included if the crop was for on-farm feed. This usually corresponded to Agricultural Land Classes 3c, 4 and 5. There was a presumption against including dairy land unless conditions were particularly difficult, e.g. significantly longer in-wintering period. The SDA land was not reassessed. It was presumed that it . . . fulfilled these physical criteria, even though some areas would have undergone significant land improvement over the years. Again, there was still an economic advantage being in the SDA.
> The LFA was reviewed in 1990 and, as far as I am aware there were little or no changes of substance. The EC required the area be described by listing the parishes . . . that lay wholly or partly within the line drawn. These were notified to the EC in 1992.
> Flagg Hall farm lies at an altitude of 900–1,000 ft (270–300 m) above sea level, deeply within the SDA. Land normally at this altitude especially well away from the coast would normally be expected to be considerably"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The quotation is extremely long and I think that the point was well made some time ago.

Mr. McLoughlin: The quotation helps me to make my point, but I shall draw it to a conclusion if I am out of order. I merely point out that the farm in question is now included in the SDA, yet its stocking level is compatible with areas outside the SDA.

At the weekend, I met farmers whose farms were partly inside and partly outside the SDA. That happens particularly often in my constituency. One can see on a map where the line runs through villages that only part of a village may be included. That means that neighbouring farmers are in completely different financial environments: some obtain a full benefit and others within the SDA receive a reduced amount of Government subsidy. The Government might argue that there should be no subsidy at all—perhaps they can argue that—but there is a subsidy. They have accepted that a subsidy will exist. They must therefore be sure that, when they arrived at the decision, they fully understood the whole question of the SDA.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman clarified what he is suggesting. It is surely inevitable that wherever one draws a line, there will be a difference between one side and the other, whether it results from devolution or the definitions of "area". Is he arguing for a single-rate payment?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am arguing that the Government should consider whether they became confused—let me be as kind as that—between the moorland line and the

[Mr. McLoughlin]

SDA line. Surely they did not mean to include in the SDA line areas where there are farms that provide the same quality of service and production levels as some of the areas outside it. That is totally incompatible with what the Government are saying. I do not believe that any farms within the moorland line could produce what some farms in the SDAs are currently producing, in both quality and quantity.

I fully accept that a great deal of work has gone into the policy and that there are difficult decisions to be taken. I could say much more on the subject and I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I quoted at length from a letter, but it is relevant to the way in which the old SDAs have grown up over the years. They have a huge history. Part of the Government's problem is that, if they are relying on maps that were drawn, as we have heard today, in the late 1940s and early 1950s, it is a mistake. It would be wrong for agriculture to use such criteria.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), who speaks from the Front Bench, wrote to the Secretary of State to explain that more than 5,000 farms will be in danger from the proposal. That is absolutely right. They are, in general, smaller farms and farms that require much more labour, because they are hill livestock farms and arable farms.

The Government's proposal is a mistake: it will pit farmer against farmer and divide farming communities. I very much hope that the Government will reconsider the proposal as a matter of urgency and that the Minister will comment on that today, because there have been reports that the Secretary of State will be away from London for some time, and the issue is of considerable interest to farmers in my constituency, who are very worried about their livelihood. I therefore hope that the Minister will give us an idea of the timetable to which the Department is working if a review of the system is taking place. I hope that he will reassure the farmers whom I met in my constituency over the weekend that a review is happening. They hope that the Government are taking on board the many representations that they receive.

10.14 am

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on obtaining the debate, which is timely. Much of my constituency is a less-favoured area and much of it is a severely disadvantaged area. That has had a considerable impact. I have had no fewer than three meetings with the National Farmers Union in my constituency in the past couple of weeks, and received numerous letters. Farmers are not often moved to write to Members of Parliament, even when those Members have many farms in their constituencies, as I have, but I have been flooded with letters from farmers, because of the impact that the system has had on them.

I do not intend to oppose the Minister on the issue. In principle, decoupling is right. If it had been left to me, I would hope that we would not be in the position that we are today. However, I am taking it as read that we are in that position, and I hope that we can move on from it and smooth out some of the worst anomalies in the system.

We have heard good examples of the problems caused by the single farm payment in the SDA areas. In particular, it is clear that livestock farming—suckler cows and dairy—in the SDA areas will be most affected. However, moving to area payments will hit livestock farming everywhere; livestock farmers will lose out the most, except those who practise extensive sheep farming in moorland areas. I would welcome recognition from the Minister that the change will affect livestock farmers the most.

I shall quote briefly from three letters from farmers in my constituency to give some idea of the scale of the problem. However, I shall not name those farmers, because the letters contain financial information. In the first letter, the farmer says:

"We farm 1,000 acres of LFA. You cannot class us as a moorland. We employ 4 people—they will be out of a job. We have 300 cows—they will have to go. My farm neighbours are English lowland, receiving £220 a hectare."

That is the estimated figure; the farmer estimates that he will receive only £72 a hectare. He continues:

"My Welsh neighbours are getting even more at £300 a hectare. How can I compete with that?"

Another farmer says:

"In 1999 I myself farmed 115 ha, running 800+ breeding ewes, 35 suckler cows and growing 12.71 ha of cereal, total subsidy before HFA and ESA payments of £22,891. At current projected levels, in the year 2012 the total flat-rate payment would amount to £8,625, amounting to a reduction of 62.3 per cent."

Another farmer, who has 1,300 sheep and 80 single suckler cows that are run on 229 hectares, says:

"Similar to many farms in the Clun Forest I have calculated a 70 per cent. drop in support payments under the proposed SFP. By 2012, 229 hectares qualifying for an estimated SDA payment of £75 as opposed to the estimated non SDA payment of £225, would see a shortfall of £34,350 a year."

The impact on individual farms in my constituency is considerable.

The environmental impact has already been mentioned. Mixed farms are regarded as being good for the environment and for the appearance of the countryside. However, many farmers, when faced with such a situation, will be tempted to move away from mixed farming into sheep ranching, which would have a considerable impact on the appearance of the countryside and the environment. I do not pretend to be an expert on the matter, but I understand, for instance, that orchids tend to grow where cows graze, but that if sheep are put on the same land, the orchids will disappear. The policy has many, perhaps unintended, consequences.

I shall not follow some Conservative Members in being too critical of the Secretary of State, because I understand that the National Farmers Union has had meetings with her on the issue, and have found her quite accommodating. I believe that she is seeking industry consensus about changes to the system.

Unlike the Conservative Members who have spoken, I shall not urge moving the current line to the moorland area, but shall propose the creation of three areas by separating the current SDA moorland area into two. That would be a lot fairer. The problem for the SDA farmers is that the moorland areas have been included, so subsidy will rise for extensive sheep farming on the moorland areas, paid for by a loss in subsidy on the mixed farms in the SDA areas. Separating the two would mean that the current subsidy received by the SDA areas would stay in those areas, because the principle is that the existing subsidy on that area is examined and then is divided between the area that can be claimed on. That is my understanding of the matter, and I hope that the Minister will confirm it. In the SDA areas that would mean that, if the moorland areas were taken out, the current subsidy received by the SDA areas would stay within those areas.

Mr. McLoughlin: Can I be absolutely sure what the hon. Gentleman is saying? Is he arguing that the SDAs outside the moorland line will still be treated differently to the disadvantaged areas?

Matthew Green: I could stand here and argue for four areas: lowland, disadvantaged areas, severely disadvantaged areas and moorland. The biggest problem is the inclusion of moorland in the SDA areas, so I am arguing for three regions: moorland, SDAs and the others, which would be DAs plus lowland. There is a problem with separating everything from moorland, because most SDAs will continue to receive hill farm allowance. There is concern that if moorland is excluded and everything else is similar, the argument for continuing to receive HFA payments in future would be rather tenuous. I do not want to throw the baby out with the bathwater, which is what a move to the moorland line would involve.

There was a meeting of more than 200 farmers at Ludlow football club last week with Kevin Pearce, the NFU livestock expert, in attendance. At the end of the meeting, there was a show of hands. About 90 per cent. of the farmers in the room—all SDA farmers—said that they would prefer the three-way split to the boundary move from the SDA to the moorland. They believed not only that that was more achievable, as the Government are more likely to agree to it—perhaps that is why they think that—but that it also seemed relatively fair to keep the SDAs' current subsidy within the SDAs. We do not know what the figures would be, but separating the SDAs out would probably bring them fairly close to what the lowland and DAs would be getting anyway. That could feasibly be even more so if the farmers' claims about high levels of subsidy are true. We must be careful about that.

I have a series of other questions, and if the Minister cannot answer them today, I hope that he will write to me, because they are matters of concern. Like the hon. Member for Hexham, I have a border constituency. Farmers in Wales have, for understandable reasons, opted for historical payments, and if I were in their position, I should have done so too. A more difficult question for them is how long that position can be sustained. Historical pay..ents have led to a number of cross-border issues. First, the actual border and where the farms are registered are not always similar. For instance, when I was first elected, I was given a list by DEFRA of the number of farms with confirmed foot and mouth cases in my constituency. The list numbered four, although there were actually nine. The first Shropshire farm to get foot and mouth was near the village of Chirbury in my constituency, but it did not appear on the list because it had a Welsh holding number, even though the farm, buildings and two thirds of the land are in England. Can the Minister confirm whether such farms will be in England or Wales, or will they have split land? That will make a difference to the levels of payment.

Alun Michael: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that if the borders proposed by Owain Glyn Dwr had been observed, Exeter and most of the east of England would be included in Wales, and we would have a completely different picture.

Matthew Green: I thank the Minister for that, but I am not sure that it will be a great reassurance to farmers now. I realise that he may not be able to give an absolute answer today, but I should appreciate him writing to me.

Secondly, there is the issue of grass keep. A lot of Welsh farmers take grass keep on the English side of the border, and vice versa. If the Welsh farmers are receiving historical payments, they will be able to afford the grass keep more on the English side. There is also the issue that many farmers will want to keep the initial 90 per cent. historical payment on as small a unit as possible. They will retreat from tenanted land in the first year, so that they can claim their historical payment on as small an area as possible, and then perhaps return to it in future. We shall see some shifting around. Will the Minister consider that point?

Thirdly, there is the issue of market distortion. I have three livestock marts in my constituency, of which Ludlow is the largest. It is a successful sheep and cattle market, and many people from Wales go there. People will be able to offer—particularly with breeding stock and suckler cows—different prices for that stock in the market. I would appreciate it if the Minister would say something about the effects of market distortion.

The effect of the inclusion of improved grassland in the set-aside rules also arises now. Many dairy farmers have relatively small farms, but if set-aside is included in the improved grassland, they will probably have to take on more land so that they can set some aside. Previously, livestock farmers were not affected by set-aside, but they will be under the improved grassland proposals. I realise that it is a European directive, and not necessarily within the Minister's control, but recognising the problem and attempting to deal with it would be welcome.

We need more details about cross-compliance. I know it is early days, but much of farmers' planning will depend on what will be expected of them in respect of cross-compliance. The Minister will probably not be able to give firm details about it now, but I hope that he will at least reassure us that they will be available as soon as possible.

In the changeover period, 90 per cent. of the potential appeals will be historical; it is very important to get the figure right for the three-year reference period. Mistakes could be made by the DEFRA, which is the body responsible for appeals. It worries me that there is no independence of appeal, and I would like the Minister to comment on that.

I shall give an example of how problems could arise. A man who farms on a relatively small scale came to see me at my surgery on Saturday. During the outbreak of foot and mouth disease, his records were stolen from his Land Rover. He had recently received some annual sheep premium and the Rural Payments Agency had back-claimed from the three years that happen to be in the reference period. He had figures for 2002 and subsequent years, and he has his premium for those years. The Rural Payments Agency checked the figures for 2002 and because his previous records had been stolen, it subsequently claimed the money back because he could not prove that he had the sheep during the important month or so in the relevant period.

I am worried that that farmer, who has been in farming for some years, could be doubly hit. I will take up the issue with the RPA to try to resolve the matter, but if we fail, he will have no historical payments because he has had his subsidy removed for the reference period. That will be serious because it will penalise him over a future eight-year period. The sum involved may not seem particularly large, but it is large to him as it is an important part of his income.

I hope the Minister appreciates that I am not trying to be oppositional. This is an important change; it is difficult to get it right and the Government are adopting an open-minded approach. I understand that the NFU is encouraged by the way the Government have responded to some of the difficulties, but I should like more assurance from the Minister that they are moving to deal with the problems of severely disadvantaged areas. I hope that the Minister will look carefully at the three-region option, which was heavily endorsed by SDA farmers in my constituency.

10.29 am

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on securing the debate, which comes at an opportune time. I warm to his comment that we have not had a debate on the Floor of the House about agriculture and I go so far as to suggest that if there had been such a debate, some of the problems that have been encountered with the SDA might have been sorted out, or at least identified, so that DEFRA would not have to reconsider the proposals. I declare my interest in such matters as they appear in the Register of Members' Interests.

I enjoyed the short history of agricultural support from the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst). I have been farming for a long time, but not during the abolition of the corn laws or in the 1920s and 1930s. I farmed while the system of deficiency payments was in operation, during intervention and export restitution and through the McSharry reforms and Agenda 2000. We are now looking forward to the new proposals. It would be perverse not to recognise that farming incomes have risen, albeit from very low levels. The current levels have been reached through better livestock prices, particularly for beef and sheep, and a short-term rise in corn prices, which have made farmers' incomes look more respectable, although they are nowhere near the levels of the early 1990s.

The one commodity that remains poorly recompensed is milk. For several years, milk farmers have sold their commodity at below the cost of production. Although individual farmers will have different costs regimes depending on whether they are owner-occupiers or tenants and their borrowing history, an estimate by the HSBC bank suggests that, on average, they have been selling milk at 2p below the cost of production. If that is multiplied by the amount of milk produced in the country it comes to £280 million; that is the amount by which the farmer subsidises the wholesale, retail and processing trade.

What can we do about that? I have one suggestion for the Minister. After the abolition of the Milk Marketing Board and the break-up of Milk Marque, farmers' co-operatives were reduced in size and did not have the economies of scale of a number of their competitors. It was suggested that individual farmers' co-operatives that decided to merge to give them a better competitive position in the industry would be referred to the Office of Fair Trading. Answering the OFT's questions would immediately cause huge expense for those farmers' co-operatives. That is a barrier to a better structure in the milk industry. Farmers believe that to be unfair when they consider the red meat processing industry, in which Grampian Meats has 50 per cent. of the market, having just purchased St. Mirren Meats. There seems to be one rule for the private sector and another for the farmers' co-operatives.

Matthew Green: My hon. Friend is probably already aware that when the DTI looked at the competition implications of Dairy Crest's recent acquisition of ACCA, it considered only the impact on the retail price for the consumer, not the impact on producers.

Mr. Williams: My hon. Friend raises an important point. In the short time that I have available, I should like to put it to the Minister that the OFT should be more transparent about what triggers an intervention. At present many farmers' organisations are afraid to go forward because of the huge expense that an OFT investigation entails.

The mid-term review is a huge opportunity for the farming industry. It will allow farmers to become business people and run their businesses according to their resources and skills, rather than being collectors of Government subsidies. It has been welcomed by the industry. We have four systems in the devolved nations of the UK. I recognise the problems on the borders between Northumberland and Scotland and between my hon. Friend's constituency and mine. Several issues will be difficult to sort out there. The devil will be in the detail. We could raise several matters here but I am sure that the Minister is well aware of them.

The SDA has caused a huge amount of concern. When the Secretary of State made her statement on the mid-term review, I was the only Member to raise the SDA, because I could see how it would affect the more intensive livestock farms as opposed to the moorland and grouse moor areas. If a Labour Government could think of any scheme to fill large landowners' bank accounts with subsidies, it would be that one.

I asked the Secretary of State about livestock SDA farms—the smaller upland farms that are the most vulnerable in terms of business, but contribute the most to the environment. They are, as the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) said, situated in some of the highest-quality landscape areas, but those landscapes exist only because of the farmers' activities.

British people value those landscapes. That is why they go to national parks in the north and west of England, and in Wales. Any exodus from those farms because the farmers' businesses became untenable would lead to a huge outcry from the British people, as they would see their landscapes and countryside changed beyond recognition.

There are several other issues of concern, such as cross-regional matters. Simon Gourlay, who is a past president of the National Farmers Union, and who farms on the Welsh border, suggested that wherever the main farmhouse is situated should be the designation for that farmholding. I know that he has written to DEFRA and the Welsh Assembly about that. Will the Minister comment on whether that would be a simpler way forward? I understand that most people, particularly if they are in SDA areas in England, would like to be on the Welsh side of the border at the moment.

Let me consider more technical issues concerning the mid-term review. I understand that Britain would contribute €485 million in digression and modulation funds, but would receive only €445 million back. That would not be enough to fund the agri-environment schemes as they are currently envisaged. Will the Minister comment on that?

I revert to an issue that has concerned me for many years, but about which I have always been regarded as old-fashioned: food security. It was at the forefront of consideration immediately after the war, in the 1950s, when agricultural policy was being decided. I do not think that we should ever forget that a hungry nation is a dissatisfied nation. We often talk of global warming and other issues; I hope that the modulated income will be used to ensure that support will continue for breeding flocks of sheep and herds of cattle, because there could be a time when farmers will become commodity brokers in livestock, and breeding will be so unprofitable that there will be a huge decrease in livestock.

The other day, I asked some young farmers what they would like to ask the Minister. The main questions that emerged were: why is not the Minister more proud of British agriculture? Why does not he celebrate the food that it produces and the way in which it looks after the countryside? If he did that, the relationship between the Government and the British agricultural industry would be a happy one.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I begin by joining other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on securing the debate. By doing so, he has done us a service. I share the view that it is a shame that the debate was not held earlier, and that we have not had an opportunity in the main Chamber to talk about undoubtedly the biggest change in agriculture for many years. My hon. Friend is a member of the Conservative Whips Office, and was supported by the Conservative Deputy Chief Whip. Both their contributions were excellent and got to the heart of the matter.

We have had a well informed and useful debate. The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) is my constituency neighbour. We may have different views about many issues, but he has always shown great understanding and knowledge of farming. It is always a pleasure to listen to him talking about the subject.

The mid-term review will affect every farmer. I repeat that, in the main, the Conservatives support the principles that underline it. We have always argued for decoupling, and the fact that it will take place at last is a considerable achievement. I do not underestimate the difficulty of implementing that decision. The Secretary of State had a very hard choice to make. However, the key decision to take was how to allocate the single farm payment. Whatever the method chosen was bound to result in some being winners and others being losers. No major group rejected the method that the Secretary of State eventually chose; most reluctantly accepted that there is some logic in the gradual phasing in of a flat-rate payment system.

A flat-rate payment system should be fairer, as it removes the divide between some supported crops and non-supported crops. It should be simpler, although I share the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) that we have not yet seen the detail, particularly of the cross-compliance conditions that will be attached to the payment. We will be keen to ensure that we are not substituting one complicated bureaucracy for another. We are also concerned about the time scale that must be introduced, and whether or not the Rural Payments Agency will be up and running and ready to implement a major change. I hope that the Minister will assure us that he is confident that the RPA will be able to put the necessary mechanisms in place.

Farmers in England accept the logic of the change and the system that the Secretary of State has chosen, but there is still unhappiness that farmers will be treated differently. Obviously, there will be differences throughout Europe. We have moved towards full decoupling, but other countries have not, which will create an unlevel playing field throughout Europe. There will also be major differences in the United Kingdom. We will no longer be able to say that there is a common agricultural policy in Europe. The fact that two identical farms on either side of the Scottish or the Welsh border will receive different amounts and that, over time, the gap between the amounts that they receive will grow will give rise to the feeling that this is unfair and that there is no equity.

I accept, however, that all farms will be faced with the same decisions because they will all be operating in a world market. Nevertheless, the fact that one farmer receives a much greater payment than another for the same environmental management is bound to lead to resentment. We have heard about farms that not only neighbour each other across a border but actually straddle borders. That will give rise to even greater resentment. Some farms have some land in Wales and some in England, some of which is inside an SDA and some outside. One example that has been drawn to my attention is that of a 600-acre Shropshire dairy farmer who has 250 acres in an English SDA, 150 in the west of England and 200 in Wales. He will receive three different entitlements for those three blocks of land, and his farming decisions will be determined not by the market but by how he can maximise his subsidy.

Part of the rationale behind the mid-term review is that it was supposed to result in a situation in which farmers decided how to farm on the basis of what they could sell in the market, not on the basis of how they could maximise their subsidy payments. I am sure that the Minister will tell me that the distortions are the result of devolution and that devolution can mean different systems for different areas. However, there is the additional difference between the payments inside the SDAs and those outside, and that is wholly the Government's decision.

I understand the intention behind the Government's decision to pay a lower rate in the SDAs than outside. However, some of the biggest gainers will still be those who own large expanses of relatively uncultivated land, particularly grouse moors as mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham. The Government have tried to meet the consequence by implementing a lower rate in the SDAs, but my concern is that they seem not to have realised that there are a large number of intensive farms within the SDAs. Those farms will see a catastrophic drop in their income.

I was concerned that, when Lord Whitty gave evidence to the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, he appeared to say that no research had been done into the effect of the changes on individual sectors. He said:

"We know what the overall effects will be but we do not know, and have not the modelling to show, the effects on individual sectors".

It is strange that we have taken such a momentous decision for farming apparently without the Government having done that research.

Yesterday, I met representatives of the Royal Association of British Dairy Farmers, who told me that there are 1,500 dairy farmers in the SDAs and that they are all likely to go out of business unless changes are made. Some of those farmers have done everything that the Government have wanted them to do. I was given the example of Wensleydale, with which I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham will be familiar. Farmers there came together to form a co-operative and are now supplying the makers of Wensleydale cheese. Those farmers have done everything that the Government have asked of them: they identified a niche market and are working together to produce a value-added, high-quality product. Half of them happen to be in the SDAs, and as a result, they will almost certainly be unable to continue in business.

That problem affects many areas of the country, including the west country, Exmoor, the Welsh borders and Northumbria, as my hon. Friend mentioned. They are some of the most beautiful areas of England, although the hon. Member for Braintree and I also see a curious charm in the East Anglian arable fields. Some of those beautiful areas depend heavily on farming for the maintenance of their environment, so the change will have a severe environmental impact as well.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham mentioned that one of his constituents is Sir Donald Curry, who has done great work in advising the Government and made sensible recommendations about the future of farming. However, he has said that he was not consulted about the decision:

"I am concerned and have had numerous calls and letters about it. The level of redistribution within the SDA is unacceptable and unforeseen."

The Government should take that seriously, and I hope that they will show flexibility. When I raised the issue on the Floor of the House with the Secretary of State, there did not seem to be much flexibility, but I am encouraged by the reports that, privately, she accepts that some movement is needed.

There are various methods of addressing the situation. My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham mentioned the possibility of increasing environmental payments, the National Farmers Union advocates three tiers rather than two, and there is the suggestion that we use the moorland line. All those proposals will have costs attached to them, and one difficulty is that we do not have any analysis of how the payments in, for example, non-SDA areas would be affected if we made those changes. I hope that the Minister will be able to say a little more about that, because it is important that we have those facts. Everyone agrees that something needs to be done. The Government, I suspect, have simply not realised the effect of the decision on thousands of extremely productive farms in the SDAs, which make a vital contribution. I remind the Minister of the opening words of the Farmers Guardian editorial:

"Anybody can make a mistake but the true test of a person, or indeed a Government, is the way you respond to it."

10.50 am

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on initiating the debate, and I agree with one of his early comments, which was echoed by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) among others. He said that although the contribution of farming to the rural economy is quite small, the contribution of farming to the countryside and the environment is enormous. That is why decoupling and paying farmers for the public benefit, rather than giving them a production-related subsidy, must be the right long-term way forward.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the area payment approach, as opposed to the historic payment approach. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire suggested that there was concern among young people that we were not sufficiently proud of British farming. Perhaps that is because of the great coverage of all that is gloomy and negative about it, when there is much positive that could be said. We have every reason to be proud of the farmers—people I meet all the time—who are entrepreneurial and creative, as well as highly committed. All that the Government are doing is trying to help them to be competitive and successful, and have a sustainable future in farming.

It is worth pointing out that farm incomes should be viewed in the context of considerable public support for agriculture. United Kingdom farmers receive about £3 billion in payments under the common agricultural policy each year—£2.5 billion in direct payments and £500 million in budgetary expenditure on market support. The Government's policy is not to attempt to intervene in the market to create artificial income, but to facilitate the right economic framework to enable farmers to succeed. Reference has been made to Sir Donald Curry's excellent work on that, and the Government's sustainable farming and food strategy sets out how we mean to work in partnership with the industry in that context.

Although there are many positive things that can be said, I want to focus in the short time available on the points that have been made by hon. Members. First, the general message seems to be positive, but each hon. Member who has spoken seems to be concerned about some of the detail of the impact of the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

The hon. Member for Hexham concentrated in particular on upland farmers and the effect of a two-area approach on those in severely disadvantaged areas. He makes a reasonable point. He and others, including the hon. Members for Ludlow (Matthew Green) and for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) have argued for a different alignment in England. I stress that we shall consider all the representations and the points that have been made to us. That is the point of a period of listening.

Hon. Members must nevertheless bear in mind that change would produce a different set of winners and losers. I do not think that it would be terribly helpful to add to rumours of the possible shifts and changes. Let us engage in conversations and examine the representations. Let us consider what consensus might be reached in the industry. Then, as always, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will want to focus on all the information that has come in, and to take a decision.

I assure hon. Members, in answer to a query that arose, that during the period when my right hon. Friend will be representing this country in several European, and other, settings, she will be well in touch with the Department and her ministerial team and will be focused on securing the right outcomes.

The hon. Member for Ludlow also focused on specific cases with a lot of detail, but seemed to argue for a retention of the link to stock levels, when decoupling is the way forward. Perhaps that point was being made by his correspondent rather than by the hon. Gentleman, but I shall certainly respond to him on the detailed issues that he raised. For instance, he referred to a case involving the Rural Payments Agency. It is my experience that, generally, comments about the agency based on the detail of individual cases can be misleading, although I should be happy to write to him about that point.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Secretary of State made her announcement in February and the Minister says that the Government are collating evidence and listening to all sections of the industry. Can he give us any idea of when the industry can expect a clearer way forward? What the Secretary of State announced obviously stands. However, if there is to be a review, it will be immensely helpful for those who are worried in the industry to know what time scale the Minister is considering.

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman and others have rightly referred to our discussions with farming organisations, including the National Farmers Union. However, it is wrong to talk about outcomes and changes while those discussions continue. My right hon. Friend is looking to make the right decision and to understand fully the points that are put before coming to a conclusion.

The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) acknowledged that any decision would cause problems. He also acknowledged the logic of a tapering approach that seeks to move to area payments, but in a way that gives people time to adjust to the changes in payments. He referred to the differences across the Welsh and Scottish borders, as well across the lines in England. However, the decisions made in Scotland and Wales are the result of devolution. It is understandable that such decisions have been taken, because, as the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire suggested, the historic payments may look more attractive in the short term. In the longer term, however, the area payments are, in our view, much more sustainable. Those who perhaps aspire to see such arrangements across the border, such as the hon. Member for Ludlow, may therefore take a different view in the longer term.

A number of detailed questions were asked, for instance, about cross-compliance. It is necessary to consider the relationship among the higher tier scheme, which involves more complex agreements, the simple voluntary scheme that is being promoted and cross-compliance, in which the minimum regulation standards are observed. A consultation on cross-compliance is due to take place shortly. That process will bring forward the details for which the hon. Member for Hexham asked and will provide an opportunity for comment and discussion. One problem is that there is always a lot of consultation when dealing with issues that are so complex for the industry. During the consultation, people complain of uncertainty, but we cannot have it both ways. We must listen and get engaged with the sort of detail that several hon. Members have raised.

I am conscious that the time I have to respond to a broad range of issues is short. I therefore undertake to write to those who have spoken to cover the points that I do not manage to reach. For instance, the approach of the Rural Payments Agency was raised. The agency has established a programme and project management system in order to deliver single payment systems by 2005. The set-aside on grassland was also mentioned. We are still discussing the rules, but we argue that the Commission should look again at its proposals, so the issue is not closed.

On the key issue, I must tell the hon. Member for Hexham that no line will be perfect; there will be anomalies somewhere, whatever lines are chosen. We shall listen carefully and ask whether there is a better way. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has put forward a sensible and coherent set of proposals. Following the consultation, we shall seek to give the greatest clarity to the industry, which is what all hon. Members want. We need a process that is sustainable in the long term, in which, as we move to the simple area system, people know the graduation of payments, and that will help to provide the certainty that is necessary to underpin a sustainable future for farming and food.

Supermarket Code of Practice

11 am

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am pleased to have secured this debate, and delighted to see the Minister. I have seen him in this position before, when he was goalkeeping behind me for the House of Commons football team, so I know that he has a safe pair of hands to assist him in responding on this important matter.

Today is an important day for me not only because of this debate: in the Lower Waiting Hall, there is an exhibition of Cornish cuisine, and one point that I want to make relates to the importance of farmers co-operating and coming together to promote a brand, and of achieving vertical integration through the supply chain.

Let me give the background to this short debate on the supermarket code of practice. The Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, both in the cross-party report on gangmasters that it published last September and last December, has identified that supermarkets can dictate market conditions. On 10 October 2000, the Competition Commission produced a report identifying the fact that supermarkets represented a complex monopoly practice, and proposed that a code of practice be established. After what I believe were a number of drafts, a code was finally published on 31 October 2001. However, according to those involved in the process, particularly from the supplier side, it was a rather watered-down version of the code that was originally proposed by the commission.

The Office of Fair Trading announced in February 2003 that it would review the success of the code's progress, and it published its report only a few weeks ago, on 20 February. What it found was no surprise to people on all sides who had been watching what was happening with the code, including suppliers, who had caused the code to be established, largely through the complaints that they made about their treatment.

The main results of the OFT review were as follows. The code was not working effectively: 80 to 85 per cent. of suppliers who responded to the survey claimed that the code had failed to effect any change in supermarket behaviour, despite the recommendations of the Competition Commission's 2000 report. However, there was no hard evidence that that was the case. Some 73 per cent. of suppliers reported a fear of complaining, which was the main reason for the code's lack of effectiveness. No cases had been brought under the code's mediation process by suppliers claiming a breach of the code. One case was brought, but it related to a contract established before November 2001, which I understood was the start date before which past contracts could not be included, so the code was not used. A number of aspects of the code were criticised, including the rather vague term "reasonableness" and other subjective terminology that was open to wide interpretation.

Rather worryingly, the OFT analysis also included the following statement:

"We do not believe that there is anything in the changes in the fortunes of UK farmers, especially the amounts they are paid for their produce, which can be linked to the code or the general behaviour of the supermarkets."

The review pointed to BSE, foot and mouth disease and the strength of the pound against the euro, rather than farmers' treatment by supermarkets, as largely responsible for farmers' misfortunes. However, farmers' organisations rightly question the assumptions behind the suggested source of their misfortunes. Two of the problems—BSE and foot and mouth disease—affect only red meat consumption and have very little impact on other sectors. Furthermore, fluctuations in the exchange rate have not resulted in fluctuations in price. If the problems had anything to do with the strength of the pound, there would be the same fluctuations in price as there have been in the exchange rate, which has not happened. Supplier organisations strongly believe that consolidation of agriculture downstream has affected the proper operation of the market.

I have read the OFT report and spoken to many farmers and farmers' organisations, and to others working in the supply chain. Many people have provided me with case material, but I could not use it even today for fear that they could be identified and de-listed, or lose contracts with buyers in the future. However, one does not have to be Sherlock Holmes to identify serious problems in the way in which the market operates. Farmers face particular challenges. They produce perishable goods, even in the case of livestock that are ready for slaughter. Growers produce goods that are ready for harvest at very particular times. They depend on their buyers playing ball and sticking to their contracts and the nature of those contracts.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising this issue.

The hon. Gentleman describes the worst effects of an unbridled monopoly. Is he aware of the report published recently by the New Economics Foundation, which states:

"270 jobs are lost each time a supermarket opens"?

Worse still, it states that

"50 farmers and small traders are forced out of business every week" by the operation of the big four.

Andrew George: I am grateful for that intervention. I was not aware of that finding, although I am not surprised to hear it. The main purpose of the debate is to examine the effect on the supplier side, however, and not simply the impact that supermarket chains undoubtedly have on other traders in the environs of sites where they establish new supermarkets. I do not doubt that some studies have identified a net job loss rather than a net job gain in the wider economy, and that supermarkets would want to debate that issue.

My point is that supermarket practices place farmers in a particularly difficult situation. For example, farmers and growers have to buy the packaging materials that supermarkets use, and often they cannot do so at cost price. Many farmers know full well that they are being charged for packaging that may simply be a plastic bag in which to put broccoli or a cauliflower, and that the supermarkets are charging them more than the cost price of those materials as a way of recouping money. Payments are also often delayed. On 17 January 2003, the Financial Times published a study into supermarket power. On page 17, the study said that in 2001, Tesco, Asda and Sainsbury's alone extracted an additional £623 million from suppliers through longer credit terms. Supermarkets are obviously in a strong position to negotiate better credit terms.

Retrospective conditions are often added to contracts. Suppliers often do not even see their contracts. Suppliers who want to keep their contract may have to make unexpected contributions to promotions of the sort that I am sure we have all seen, such as "Buy one, get one free" or "Buy one, get one at half price." Farmers often make the major contribution enabling supermarkets to make such offers. Farmers might also have to deal with consumer complaints and with recompensing the consumer. It is sometimes unclear, particularly in the case of perishable goods, whether the cause of the problem lies with the handling and storage arrangements at supermarkets rather than with the farmer who supplied the goods.

There is often a problem with contracts being changed at short notice. Contracts are sometimes ended after the plants are already in the ground or ready for harvest. That happened recently to a supplier not many miles from my constituency. There has also been threatening behaviour.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that not all farmers deal directly with supermarkets? They may deal, for instance, with slaughterhouses that have direct contracts with the supermarkets. Such farmers could be in a weak position because of the monopoly of the supermarket even though they do not deal directly with it.

Andrew George: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Particularly in the red meat sector, it is noticeable that, with consolidation, some of the sector is growing to such a level that it can negotiate better deals and better contracts with the supermarkets and use its market muscle, but it is true that many farmers supplying to slaughterhouses have to be extremely careful.

In one case, a grower decided to switch his supply to another co-operative that was supplying another supermarket. He received a threatening letter from the original supermarket saying that it would make sure that he never supplied any source that was a source for the other supermarket. It ultimately apologised for the letter and withdrew it, but the fact is that we know that such practices go on. There is a severe fear of de-listing. That happens throughout the food chain; it does not apply only to the suppliers. Other food supply organisations and representatives, some of which are very substantial names and businesses, have raised similar concerns and fears in briefings to me prior to this debate.

The consumer has an important role to play. There is a general impression—indeed, the OFT gives us the same impression—that the consumer is a two-dimensional person who is interested only in price and nothing else. My own impression is that consumers are much more sophisticated. Price is clearly a key determinant, or at least the impression of low price is. Supermarkets often give the impression of low price while in fact people end up spending more than they originally intended. However, price is not the only determinant. It is quite clear from consumer surveys and from the views of consumer-based organisations such as the National Federation of Women's Institutes, which is supporting the need for further intervention in the field, that consumers are interested in other values as well as price, including concerns such as local sourcing, food miles, environmental impact and support for British producers. We have just come out of fair trade fortnight, which identified a great deal of interest across the nation in producers and conditions not only in this country, but in other countries.

I want the Minister to look carefully at the OFT report. The OFT is suggesting that it will undertake further research. Although that is welcome, there is a great deal of frustration: following the original report from the Competition Commission in 2000, the suggestion that we will undertake further research is not good enough. He might consider establishing a post with what could be called a particular function, as a Minister and ministerial discretion can direct action that is more important than research, rather than requiring primary or secondary legislation. Whether we called the holder of such a post a food trade inspector, a watchdog, and ombudsman or whatever, it would be useful to have a clear sense of purpose within the OFT to achieve a number of critical improvements to the way in which the food supply chain operates.

First, the outcome of the OFT report shows the importance of the need for anonymity to overcome the problem of fear. The OFT needs to be proactive, not to react to complaints. It should proactively undertake investigations, possibly on the basis of confidential tip-offs, although often simply by looking at areas of the supply chain where it perceives difficulties. Subjective language such as "reasonableness" should be replaced with more objective language clearly outlining the length at which payments will be received. There needs to be greater transparency in the food chain. Emphasis needs to be placed on the fact that procedures are in conformity with the code, and perhaps the annual accounts of the larger retailers could contain a statement to that effect.

Where a complaint is made, the appointment of a mediator should not be the responsibility of the supermarket; it could perhaps be the responsibility of the OFT, the complainant and the supermarket acting jointly. The bad publicity that would result from the publication of a report's findings would make a big difference to the way in which supermarkets operate. I am suggesting not that the OFT should ensure that reparations and compensation are paid where a problem is found, but simply that it should monitor the payment of reparations and compensation where the report identifies a need.

Therefore, I am not convinced that there is a need for further legislation of any kind, but we must have clear ministerial direction and clear ministerial bottle if we are to take the issue on.

11.16 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing a debate on a subject that is important not only to suppliers, but to supermarkets and consumers. He outlined the case excellently, and I shall try to respond to many of the points that he made. I am also grateful to the hon. Members for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) for their comments. The issues clearly affect all those hon. Members' constituencies, and I acknowledge their work in bringing them to the Government's attention. I say that not least of the hon. Member for St. Ives, with whom I have enjoyed time on the football pitch, as he rightly said. On occasion, we have worked well together and we can perhaps do so now to resolve this issue.

It is important that I explain the background to the current supermarket code of practice before attempting to consider the way forward. In 1999–2000, the supermarket sector was the subject of an extensive investigation by the Competition Commission. The investigation was undertaken in response to a reference made by the OFT under the Fair Trading Act 1973 to consider the existence, or possible existence, of a monopoly over the supply in Great Britain of certain groceries by certain supermarkets. That reference reflected complaints that supermarkets had been placing unreasonable demands on their suppliers. The investigation therefore focused on the supply of groceries, particularly to the UK's four largest supermarkets, which at the time were Tesco, Sainsbury, Safeway and Asda.

It is important to note that the report, which was published in October 2000, concluded that the industry was broadly competitive and that, overall, excessive prices were not being charged and those supermarkets were not earning excessive profits. However, it identified three situations in which competition was distorted and which operated against the public interest. The first concerned the relationships between the largest supermarkets and their suppliers. The commission identified several practices that, when engaged in by the larger supermarkets—those with significant buying power—adversely affected the competitiveness of some of their suppliers. As a result, those suppliers were likely to invest less in new product development, which, in turn, could lead to lower-quality products and less consumer choice.

The commission therefore recommended that a code of practice be drawn up to cover the practices that it had identified and that the code be binding on supermarkets with at least an 8 per cent. share of the market. The four supermarkets that were the subject of the commission's adverse findings were required to give legally binding undertakings under section 88(2) of the Fair Trading Act 1973. The supermarket code of practice, which forms a part of those undertakings, was designed specifically to address the unsatisfactory aspects identified by the commission in the dealings between supermarkets and their suppliers of groceries. In short, it provides for those dealings to take place on a clearer and more predictable basis, and the OFT is empowered to review how the code is working in practice.

The October 2000 Competition Commission report identified two other practices whereby competition was distorted and operated against the public interest—selling some frequently purchased products below cost and varying prices in different areas in the light of local competition. The commission concluded that such practices, when carried out by the large supermarkets, contributed to a situation in which the majority of products were not fully exposed to competitive pressure. It considered several remedies, including a ban on below-cost selling, but concluded that such remedies would be disproportionate to the adverse effects found. It therefore decided not to make recommendations in respect of those two practices.

It is important to note that, in looking at below-cost selling, the commission was not concerned about whether the selling price was below the cost of production. Rather, it was concerned about whether products sold by supermarkets were below the price at which the supermarket had purchased them. Even if the commission had decided to recommend a ban on below-cost selling, it would not have prevented supermarkets from paying suppliers less than the cost of production. I hope that I have given hon. Members a better understanding of the background to the code of practice.

I now turn to the legal details. As I explained, the supermarkets' code of practice was drawn up in accordance with a recommendation in the Competition Commission's October 2000 report on supermarkets. It came into force, as the hon. Member for St. Ives said, on 17 March 2002. It was designed to regulate a limited number of practices engaged in by the larger supermarkets that the commission felt distorted competition and operated against the public interest.

The code is legally binding on the supermarkets that were the subject of the commission's adverse finding—those with a market share of 8 per cent. or more at that time. Because Morrisons was not the subject of the Commission's adverse finding, it cannot be bound by the code even after it completes its acquisition of Safeway. However, we understand that Morrisons has indicated to the OFT that it would be prepared to abide by the code on a voluntary basis.

I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the code was never intended as a panacea to remedy all the ills that have been found and deal with all the issues that he raised. It is a formal remedy to an adverse finding by the Competition Commission. As such, its scope and application cannot be extended to cover issues or parties that were not the subject of the commission's adverse finding. It does not regulate the base price paid to suppliers for their products, which is a matter for commercial negotiation. Neither could it do so, as that was not an issue on which the commission made an adverse finding.

The OFT is required to review the operation of the code on an annual basis. It published its first review of the operation of the code on 20 February this year. The review found a widespread belief among suppliers that the code was not working properly, as the hon. Gentleman has outlined. However, it found no hard evidence to support allegations that the code had been breached. I recognise his point that it is difficult for suppliers to come forward if they feel that they are going to be in breach of the code. That is where it becomes difficult to obtain the hard evidence that we need to act. Although he must have a heavy case load, if he would like to talk in confidence, I am prepared to meet him following today's debate and consider in detail how we can best pass that concern on to the OFT. I recognise that there is a difficulty.

Andrew George: I thank the Minister for his offer to meet and I am keen to take it up. Does he accept that, given the nature of the OFT report's findings, which identified a sense of fear among suppliers to the supermarkets, the code cannot carry on as it presently stands? A degree of anonymity is required by anyone attempting to interface with it.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I recognise the point. I will try to come on to what the OFT is doing and what we need to consider. Outside the official response to its work, I take the issue seriously and will be working on it and looking closely at what the OFT says. That is why I wanted to speak to the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members who have hard evidence, because we need such evidence to obtain a result.

As part of its review, the OFT sought information from more than 60 trade associations representing the suppliers, as well as other interested suppliers and the supermarkets. I understand that 35 organisations replied, including a few individual grocery suppliers for the regions that we both know well. Although responses came from a small number of organisations, the OFT is confident that the views expressed are broadly representative of grocery suppliers overall. We think that trade associations with which the grocery suppliers have been involved have put the case across.

As the hon. Gentleman said, much of the information that was received was anecdotal and came without hard facts. We want to obtain those facts. The OFT has found it difficult to come to any firm conclusions about how individual supermarkets are operating under the code, and particularly about whether there has been any breach.

It is fair to say, however, that the OFT's consultation exercise has revealed several points. There is a widespread belief among suppliers that the code is not working effectively, and the main reason identified for the perceived lack of effectiveness appears to be a fear of complaining among suppliers, as we have recognised. The OFT has referred to a climate of apprehension among suppliers. That seems to relate to suppliers' fear that they would be de-listed by supermarkets, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. I ask the suppliers, trade associations and others to work with the OFT to ensure that we have hard facts on which to operate. The OFT noted that no cases had gone to mediation under the code and that the only written complaint concerning an alleged breach related to events that took place before the code came into force.

When supermarkets originally made their undertakings, the OFT encouraged traders to build up dossiers of alleged breaches of the code. We must ensure that we devise a process that will enable complaints to be made. The OFT takes the matter seriously and is examining it in greater detail. It intends to carry out a further audit of the situation, because it recognises that the code of practice is not working effectively. That will be its starting point.

I accept what was said about the speed at which we need to operate because, as the Minister for Employment Relations, Competition and Consumers, I am concerned about the treatment of consumers in relation to some of the issues that have been raised.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of why there is not an ombudsman, a regulator or someone at the OFT with specific responsibility for this area. I know that a number of people have called for such a post. However, I am not clear what an ombudsman or individual regulator would do that the OFT is not already doing. The OFT has said that it recognises that there is a problem, and the basis for an annual review is in place, although we need to find a better procedure through which individuals can complain and retain their anonymity. The hon. Gentleman is right that there is no need for further legislation or more bureaucrats to look into the matter. As has already been said, the OFT has the power to investigate complaints against supermarkets.

Andrew George: When the Minister and I meet, perhaps we could explore the matter further. It is clear to me that there are a number of areas in which it would be helpful for the OFT to provide a clear focus for action. It should be proactive in producing and publishing reports, and it should address the issue of anonymity. Such an approach by the OFT would ultimately be in the interests of supermarkets, because it would be good for them to be able to demonstrate greater transparency and to reassure consumers that they are not damaging British producers.

Mr. Sutcliffe: There is no disagreement between us on the need for the OFT to act or on the need for its action to be based on factual rather than anecdotal evidence. The view that the code is not working effectively should be challenged on the basis of facts. That would make the whole situation transparent, and people would feel that their grievances had been properly examined. I want the OFT to continue to examine the position in the terms raised by the hon. Gentleman, and I also want consumer protection issues to be taken into account.

The hon. Gentleman said that supermarkets play an important role in the UK, and I do not think that the measures that he is asking us to adopt are anti-supermarket. The code was the result of an initial reference by the OFT to the Competition Commission. We need to ensure that the OFT gets things right. If it produces hard evidence, we will act upon it, because it will be in the public interest to do so.

The hon. Gentleman has raised an important issue. I undertake to meet him to discuss how to ensure that factual evidence from suppliers or their trade associations is put before us. I shall continue to work with the OFT to ensure that there is a speedy response to any concerns that are raised, and shall try to get everyone's agreement on how to establish an effective code of practice. I am pleased that Morrisons is prepared to operate the code voluntarily, but we need to re-examine that issue.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

The hon. Gentleman raised these matters in a spirit of co-operation, and in that spirit, I am sure that we can reach a solution that will allow suppliers and consumers to be protected, while clarifying the supermarkets' position. I congratulate him on raising the issue.

Water Framework Directive

2 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I like to think ahead and plan what I am going to say in my speeches, and today I thought that I would start by saying that the title of today's debate is dull and uninformative. I look around at the empty seats and I see that that is all too true. How prescient I was. The words "water framework directive" conceal legislation, admittedly secondary legislation, that is both highly complex and hugely significant for the environment. It is therefore important that the subject reaches a wider audience, and this debate is my contribution to getting the message across to the wider world.

In a sense, I do not need to apologise for the subject being dull, because that is a problem for the Minister for the Environment, who will want to take people along with him. Eventually the legislation will have enormous effects. It will touch the livelihoods of many and the lives of everyone in this country. When people wake up to find the great influence that the legislation has on them they will want to know why they were not involved. It is a few years before it takes full effect, but I want the Minister to be able to tell those people that they had every opportunity to contribute to the debate and to make their voices heard in the decision making, and that it is their fault, not the Government's, that they did not.

I know that the Minister has worked hard with the devolved Administrations because some of the responsibility for implementing the directive lies with devolved authorities. River networks tend not to respect borders. One set of regulations deals with Northumberland jointly with the Scottish Parliament, precisely because the network crosses from one jurisdiction to another. It is particularly important to liaise with the devolved Administrations because there are joint responsibilities on the ground.

Water is in the title of the directive, but the framework will have much wider impacts than just on water. I want to start by dealing with the issue of water alone. Heaven knows, it is vital enough. I was struck by the newspaper reports of the Pentagon's assessment of the threats faced by the United States. While threats of terrorism remain and in the US they still talk of rogue states that they must regard as enemies, it was striking how one of the Pentagon's top worries is future conflicts over scarce water resources around the world. If wars are to be fought over water, clearly it is time to think ahead and carry out the work that will prevent such conflicts.

I hope that countries such as ours in the developed world can help developing countries to manage their future water supplies. This is why the framework is so important. When we start to help others, when we start to advise them and to lecture them about how to manage their water sustainably, it behoves us to get our own house in order first. This is where the directive is so significant. We want to be able to tell the rest of the world that here in Europe we have done everything possible to manage our water suppliers responsibly, sustainably and in line with good environmental practice, and to urge them to do the same. I want us to be able to lead by example and speak with authority when we do that work overseas.

The water framework directive requires all European member states to draw up plans to protect and enhance the quality of rivers, lakes, estuaries, coastal waters and groundwaters, and by 2015 to have in place river basin management plans that will be reviewed every six years thereafter. It is an enormously complex task. It is very challenging, even with a timetable that seems so lengthy. There is plenty to be done. The Government have already been criticised for not doing enough fast enough, and I shall come to that.

I want, however, to start in my usual reasonable, good-natured way by giving the Minister credit for the things that the United Kingdom has done well. Drinking water quality in England and Wales is something of which we can be genuinely proud. In 2002, there was 99.87 per cent. compliance with quality standards. It is pretty difficult to get better than that, although that statistic hides the fact that there has been a considerable improvement during the past seven years. Since 1997, leakages from the water pipe network have been reduced by 20 per cent.

Our beaches, rivers and drinking water are the cleanest that they have been for a century—a pretty creditable record. Last year, a record 332 UK beaches won seaside awards from clean-up campaigners. The same year, 105 UK beaches were awarded the prestigious blue flag, compared with just 17 in 1992. Some 94 per cent. of UK river networks are of good or fair biological and chemical quality—an all-time high. However, that statistic hides another from English Nature, which says that less than one third of rivers in sites of special scientific interest are of a satisfactory standard.

While I am in the mood for giving the Minister credit for the good things, let me also mention the Water Act 2003, which is to be warmly welcomed. We now have in place a system for the comprehensive management of future water abstractions. Abstractors have a duty to use water efficiently, public bodies must make water conservation an aim of their operations and the Consumer Council for Water has a sustainability duty. Those are all good achievements on the part of the Government.

I congratulate the Government on one more thing—their principal guidance to the water regular Ofwat. There was speculation in the newspapers a couple of weeks ago that No. 10 had spiked DEFRA's guns and was going to insist on lowering environmental standards in the next round of water charging to keep consumers' bills at reasonable levels. In the end, however, last week's guidance made it clear that the Government have taken a sensible approach that balances further environmental improvements against reasonable price controls between 2005 and 2010.

The current price review, or asset management plan 4, highlights an issue that often arises when I talk to people about the water framework directive—the relationship between the directive's requirements and everything else that we do as regards our water environment. How does the framework legislation relate to the periodic review of water price limits, the "polluter pays" principle, land use planning, flood management, economic and social regeneration, biodiversity issues, fisheries and marine conservation, health and amenities? Those are enormously important issues, but we do not always see the links between the framework directive, our secondary legislation under it and the Government's wider legislation and aims.

Some say that the Government's approach is unambitious and that they are technically and narrowly implementing the directive at the last minute. The subject is so important and so exciting, and it has so great an influence on so many areas of life, that the Government would be missing a trick if they did not do something far more ambitious. It is as though they were a painter who had been presented with a great canvas, a superb subject and a vast array of colours, but who chose to do a little drawing in one colour at the corner of the canvas. It is important that we inject into people the feeling that this is an opportunity that no one should miss. I say to the Minister: let us be bold, let us have a vivid, unforgettable masterpiece as a result of his work at the canvas.

When it comes to the progress that we have made, the original directive gave us until the end of last year to transpose its provisions into domestic legislation. I am not sure whether the Minister will say that he just made it or that he just missed it, because the regulations were laid before the House in December 2003 and came into force at the beginning of 2004, but in fairness to him, several member states have not yet managed to achieve that, so we are ahead of some members of the European Union.

The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee considered the framework, and wrote an excellent report. The Committee criticised the Government, saying that they did not seem seized of the urgency of the task; and it called on them to adopt a more positive and more active approach. Among those wanting to urge their views upon me for today's debate was Water UK, which still has a list of concerns on matters that it says are not clear enough.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for missing the first couple minutes of my hon. Friend's speech. I am a member of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, so I bear some responsibility for that report. We said that the Government had an awful lot to do, but that we would need to see how resources were to be locked in or it would be a bit of a wish list. We were apprised of how serious an issue it was, which is why we linked it in with the Water Act. We wanted cause and effect to be locked into one. Would my hon. Friend like to comment on that?

Mr. Kidney: Frankly, that clarification is all of a piece with people saying, "Let's be ambitious in how we implement this. Let's make sure that we have firm links to other issues that we think important, such as biodiversity, the management of wetlands and flood prevention. Let us build those things in and plan it from the beginning, so that we get there in the end rather than leave things to the last minute in a rush to be compliant with the directive timetable." That will lead to greater cost rather than less. Being able to plan ahead should enable us to gain the maximum benefits, but without the costs that might come with slow, tardy implementation.

I mentioned Water UK, which was represented in the Minister's third round of consultation. On a different tack, the non-governmental organisations are broadly supportive of all that the Government are trying to achieve, but they still speak of gaps and delays. As I said a moment ago, we have already had three rounds of consultation, but the Government are planning a communications strategy this year, and the Environment Agency will be responsible for the preparation of a public participation strategy. The Minister may say that some of that consultation is already in hand as part of this year's programme.

I turn to the question of linkages and inter-relationships. Diffuse pollution gives a good illustration of the scale and difficulty of trying to make decisions that please everyone. Many respondents to previous consultations said that such pollution was a matter of concern and demanded to know the Government's answer. In a debate pack prepared by the House of Commons Library—they are marvellous documents—I saw that a Plymouth newspaper had quoted a DEFRA spokesperson as saying last December that the Department intended to consult on diffuse pollution and its effect on agriculture by the end of March 2004. I have not seen that consultation yet, and it is already the middle of the month. Where is it?

Farmers are sensitive about the subject, although I hasten to stress that there are many sources of diffuse pollution. Indeed, some sources are urban. The National Farmers Union branch in Stafford urged that point on me this morning. It is ironic that 42 members of that branch had arranged many months ago to visit Parliament today; they urged me to pass the message on to the Minister that an awful lot of diffuse pollution does not come from farms.

At one end of the range of options for dealing with the subject is fresh regulation. However, the burden of complying would be borne by the so-called polluters, including farmers; it has been estimated that it could cost as much as £400 million. That might stamp out the problem, but the cost would be so high as to drive many farmers and others out of business. I hope that the Minister would find that outcome unacceptable. At the other end of the scale is the light-touch approach, seeking voluntary co-operation with those responsible for the pollution, but ending up with no or little improvement. I hope that the Minister would rule out that outcome.

What choice does the Minister have between those two extremes? What resources does he have at his disposal to help make his approach work? We have just been through a round of common agricultural policy reform and declared how we will apply single payments and insist on cross-compliance in this country. Are resources available through that policy that could be used to address diffuse pollution? That would be a good example of the inter-relationship between two different subjects. If that funding is all accounted for, where will we find the money for incentives for farmers to co-operate? We also need to consider the "polluter pays" penalties for those who do not co-operate. Would there be pressure for further CAP reform in the European Union's common implementation policy for the directive, which would come in time to provide public funding for the incentives that I mentioned for people such as farmers?

Tackling pollution brings not only environmental and social benefits, but economic ones. The water companies spend £120 million a year removing pesticides from water courses. By acting firmly, decisively and in good time, we can save money for the future.

We can achieve those objectives if we want to. The Government have the right words. To those who have not seen it, I commend the document "Directing the Flow", published in November 2002. Pages 28 and 29 discuss the directive, and it is a superb statement of the Government's approach. The Government's response to the Select Committee report was also thorough. Those are good signs, but some explicit links are missing that we might have expected to see. The Water Act has been passed and the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill is about to become law, but we did not do what was necessary about flood management and land use planning when we had the opportunity. Worries are still being expressed by people about the future tackling of diffuse pollution and the treatment of wetlands. I noticed that the second newsletter from the European Union directors of the water framework directive states that they have issued new guidance on wetlands. What does the Minister think of that guidance? However, there are challenging targets. There were challenging targets last year to get the law in place, and there are challenging targets this year—for example, for the Environment Agency to consult on its draft strategy for drawing up river basin management plans, and how to include public participation.

I am excited by this subject, and there are prospects that should excite us. There is potential to enhance all three legs of sustainable development. Environmentally, we can have cleaner, more adequate water supplies, improved biodiversity and better protection for sites of special scientific interest, wetlands and local wildlife sites. Economically, we can have lower clean-up costs in future, improved tourism and leisure opportunities and regeneration opportunities along the way. Socially, we can challenge the problem of flood management and stop it at source in river areas before it reaches urban developments downstream. We can have greater access to the countryside and healthier living standards as people use the opportunity to take exercise as well as eat healthily. Rural businesses such as farming can carry out their work in a more socially responsible way.

There are good prospects under this directive and the relevant legislation for us all to achieve some good objectives. They must be achieved with the active involvement of all the relevant stakeholders, not favouring businesses over environmental groups, nor vice versa. They will be led by the Environment Agency as the Government's champion on the subject, although people have questioned whether the Environment Agency has sufficient skills and resources to do its work properly, and those are points for the Minister to bear in mind.

I hope that the Minister agrees that education will be key. DEFRA is working on a communications strategy as one element that will ensure success in the future. Other elements involve Parliament. I admit that today is a bad example, as not many hon. Members have turned up for the debate, but there is interest in the issue, and we should ensure that people understand how important it is. I should like regular reports to be made to Parliament and debates to be held. If we cannot get Members into the Chamber, will the Minister consider seminars to get them together to discuss vital matters before final decisions are taken and to listen to different points of view?

Will DEFRA have a champion of its own? I am sure that the Minister is a fine champion of his Department on many subjects, and does not have as much time to devote to this matter as the stakeholders—the public and Members of Parliament—might want. Will he consider whether someone could be the focus of contact with the public and the production of the news as it comes in, and involve people in future debates and discussions? We should keep working with stakeholders, and should not believe that three consultations were good enough simply because the legislation was passed. There must be many more consultations like those. I have not checked the full list of who has been consulted. Does it include local government planners and the regional development agencies, which are so important to the regeneration of the areas that are affected? I know that a pilot is being run in the Ribble basin. Perhaps regular news, updates on progress and any findings that are emerging would be helpful to Members of Parliament and to others with an interest in this subject. Surely that pilot would make a good case study?

Mr. Drew: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the more interesting aspects of the water framework directive is not only its impact in this country and in Europe, but the ideas that it may produce for the wider world? I am very interested in recent discussions on the Nile basin. Several of our water companies have visited the region to advise countries that lie alongside the Nile. Surely the directive should stimulate such activities, because the whole world has to be careful about the use of water, not just the western world?

Mr. Kidney: My hon. Friend confessed that he had missed the beginning of my great speech today. He sat down behind me, so I do not know precisely when he came into the Room, and he may have missed the significant point that I made at the beginning of my speech about how important it is to be able to speak with authority and lead the world by example when we ask others to do in their countries what we have shown that we can do at home. My hon. Friend makes a very good point, because it agrees with the point that I made earlier.

At the beginning, I said that the title of the debate masked something of great significance. I am sure that many will find the regulations and the regulatory impact assessment dry and lifeless, but so much good can come from a positive approach that the Minister has the power to see to it that the words jump off the page and splash some colour into all our lives. I was trying to think of suitable alliterations to liven up this part of my speech. Let us see more babbling brooks, sweet springs and rippling rivers. These are things that the Minister has it in his power to achieve. Few issues are more important to our communities, our country and our world than water management. I hope that the debate, sluggish though it was at the beginning, will start a sustained and serious campaign of support for what our country and all the countries of the EU seek to achieve.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Because I shall speak with passion, nothing that I say will be reported anywhere, so I can be candid.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on introducing this very important debate. I also congratulate the Minister, even before I say a word about what he has achieved, precisely because he has achieved so much. He has fought and won a notable battle with the forces of No. 10 and Ofwat in ameliorating the decisions that have been taken about the future care of this country's water resources. The water framework directive preamble says:

"Water is not a commercial product like any other but, rather, a heritage which must be protected, defended and treated as such".

I do not always go overboard in my support for European directives, but on the present occasion I want literally to go overboard and splash in the shallows of the Hampshire Avon. Every weekend, in Salisbury, I look over the parapet of the Ayleswade bridge, which was built in 1247, and consider the depth and quality of the water; I observe the bottom and whether the river appears healthy. I reflect on what we are doing to that river.

I have known the river since I was a child. I paddled in it when I was two years old. I fell into it when I was four years old, and was rescued by the Bishop of Bombay. I have rowed on it and watched birds and flowers there. I am a keen supporter of the water meadows trust. As the Member of Parliament for what is a wonderful constituency, that river means a lot to me.

It is a short step from the general words of my preamble to the principle that the price of water must reflect the full cost of protecting water heritage. That is the issue that I want to discuss. The cost must reflect the full cost of finding alternatives to damaging abstractions and pollution. The long campaigning—20 years, in my case—to protect the quality of the Hampshire Avon from abstraction and effluents is a vivid illustration of what the water framework directive is about.

The first paragraph of article 1 of the directive states that the purpose of the directive is to establish a framework that "prevents further deterioration and protects and enhances the status of aquatic ecosystems".

Thus the directive is about protecting water qualitatively and quantitatively, and therefore its objectives overlap with the ecological objectives of the habitats directive. That is what is at stake in the argument that has been raging for years in my constituency about abstraction by Wessex Water—a fine company with lots of dedicated personnel who are in constant conflict with Ofwat about their investment plans. In the middle is the Minister.

The price review process gives far too much influence to Ofwat. Back in 1999, Ofwat succeeded in reducing prices substantially by eliminating many environmental programmes in the Wessex Water area, such as the Blashford lakes programme. That was an irony, since I recall an occasion when I had to stand in unexpectedly for the then Secretary of State for the Environment, who had just been sacked, the day before he was due to open the new Blashford lakes complex. I was sent there instead, as a Parliamentary Private Secretary. I still have a very nice print of the Hampshire Avon hanging in my bathroom, with a hastily rewritten notice underneath, with the name "Key" instead of "Ridley".

This year Ofwat wanted to cut another £5 billion from the programme and it was only a courageous fight by the Minister that prevented that. The River Wylye in my constituency has been a particular victim of what I am describing. The structure of the price review programme should be reviewed in the light of the water framework directive and the habitats directive, to ensure that it gives sufficient weight to environmental protection.

Locally, Wessex Water's draft plan for 2005 to 2010 included virtually no investment in reducing abstraction or removing phosphates from sewage treatment works. There was an allocation of £8 million, compared with a £90 million minimum request from the Environment Agency and English Nature. I understand that after a lot of pressure, Wessex Water has verbally agreed to put £10 or £12 million in its final plan, to cover investigating an alternative to the 1 billion litres a month taken from the little chalk stream of the upper Wylye and exported to Somerset. It is madness. We have massive leakage in the area, yet we are abstracting the headwaters of one of our most precious river systems to fulfil the needs of quite another part of England. The earliest that even the present scheme could have any effect on the river flows would be about 2014 or 2015. That assumes agreement by Ofwat to let Wessex Water finance it in the 2005 price review period.

There is no funding for a solution such as an agreed building programme in a Wessex Water plan, because Ofwat forced the so-called statement of intent on the Environment Agency and English Nature. The statement of intent must be reviewed every year. January is usually the month, so I expect the review to be published shortly. The plan said that Chitterne abstraction would be used as a last resort. As so many of us predicted, however, there was a failure to protect the Wylye. The abstraction at Chitterne for five months was five times the target level. The flow in the River Wylye dropped to 40 per cent. of the average. The agreement nevertheless has to run until 2007, and allows Ofwat to delay the programme and the price increases to find a solution to the low flow problem for another five years.

In spite of all that, Wessex Water last year—last summer was quite warm and dry, as I am sure hon. Members recall—failed to apply for a drought order or introduce any restrictions on supply. Of course, the issue of prices lies behind all that. In retrospect, the policy of 2000 to reduce prices by 12 per cent. was idiotic. Wessex Water bills went down by 5 per cent. in real terms in the period 2000 to 2005. Even from that artificially low base, however, prices in Wessex Water's plan increased by only 12 per cent. for 2005 to 2010, compared with 31 per cent. nationally.

The key issues on which we are fighting locally are to ensure that the £12 million really is there to investigate alternatives to the Wylye abstraction and to ensure that the investigations result in a project agreed by all the parties to eliminate abstraction from the Wylye. Eliminating the abstraction must be the answer. We must also ensure that the full Environment Agency and English Nature programme for phosphate removal is in the Wessex Water final plan, but we have not yet been promised that it will be.

The argument has been going on since 1990, when the Wiltshire fisheries association starting fighting its corner, although I started fighting back in 1983. We shall not get an answer until 2014 at the earliest. It is not acceptable that we have had to wait for a quarter of a century to remedy serious environmental damage to a special area of conservation site, which is supposedly the most important designation.

There is a huge problem of attitude. Water Voice Wessex wrote to me on 22 July 2002 about what it saw as a settlement for low flow rivers such as the Hampshire Avon. It said:

"Water Voice Wessex fought hard for customers against the original £105m proposal"— that was Blashford lakes—

"which we did not believe was cost effective, and would have increased bills significantly by £11 per year ad infinitum. This new proposal will quickly improve the low flows on the Hampshire Avon and not significantly increase customers' bills. This is a win-win for all concerned."

It is a lose-lose for all concerned. The environment will lose and there will not even be any long-term benefit for consumers, because the other problems will become greater if, for instance, phosphorous and other chemicals are not tackled.

The public consultation draft, "River Avon candidate Special Area of Conservation Strategy", published by English Nature in October 2002, said:

"The River Avon is one of the most biodiverse chalk streams in the UK, with over 180 species of aquatic plant . . . one of the most diverse fish faunas, and a wide range of aquatic invertebrates" having been recorded. There were populations of Atlantic salmon, bullhead, brook and sea lamprey, as well as flowing water vegetation, including water crowfoot. The river and adjoining areas also provided a habitat for populations of Desmoulins whorl snail, with which I am sure we all familiar.

The key issue was that the discharge of substances, including hormone-disrupting substances, mostly as a result of the pill, discharged from sewage treatment works was affecting much of the sensitive environment. Discharges of phosphorous chemicals—detergents, in other words—from point sources were being reduced, but there was a long way to go. This country must decide what it wants to do. Are we going to go down the route of cheap water for everybody, with no regard for leakage or the consequences for the environment? The leakage levels are still enormous. Paragraph 6.7 of Wessex Water's first annual report to the Minister on progress, published in January 2003, says:

"During 2002 Wessex Water continued to reduce leakage. By March 2003 leakage should be reduced to 75 million litres a day."

That has been assessed as the economic level for leakage.

"For 2003–04 leakage is predicted to reduce to just over 74 million litres a day and remain at the economic level."

Who says that that is an economic level? What sort of economics of the madhouse is it that assumes that it is all right to lose 75 million litres a day, at the same time as 1 billion litres are being taken out of the headwaters of a sensitive chalk stream on Salisbury plain? It does not add up.

The Minister will be familiar with me banging on about this, but I am convinced that the answer must be water metering. There is no way that people will realise how much water they are wasting unless they can see a little dial going round that tells them, before a bill flops on the doormat to remind them every now and then. There are plenty of ways in which we can reduce water consumption—but we are not. Planning authorities are nearly always reluctant to go for grey water schemes and to operate sustainable urban drainage systems in their areas. Planners are put under huge pressure to build more and more housing, as is Salisbury district council. Water companies are not statutory consultees. The whole thing is completely mad.

All power to the Minister if he can persuade No. 10 to take a more enlightened view. Will he please get Ofwat and Water Voice under control, and talk to them about the consequences of their fighting for the consumer? In the long run, apart from the fact that we shall all be dead, we shall not have any decent rivers in this country. I hope that in my few minutes, I have been able to instil some passion into the debate, which was so ably introduced by the hon. Member for Stafford. I am grateful to him, and wish that we could convince our constituents of the importance of the work going on in this area. It is not just about people flopping around looking for things with long Latin names, but about one of the most precious parts of the heritage of this country. If we do not take care of it, we shall lose it.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on securing the debate and introducing it in the way that he did. He painted a picture—a glowing canvas—and rightly identified lots of areas that are beginning to shine out here and there as little corners of hope. We must integrate the whole picture: when we talk about waste management, we usually grumble about having a jigsaw with no picture and only some of the pieces. Here, too, there is a vision for the future, and we must find out how to fill it in and move forward.

The subject of this debate should not be as dull as ditchwater. The directive should not be portrayed in that way, because it is one of the most exciting environmental measures that we in Parliament shall see. It sets the scene not only for this country but across Europe, and goes a long way to recognising the stress that our environment is under. It will start to put right some problems and set the scene for the future, where the climate is changing and rainfall is different, and—as the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said—our growing population is making huge demands on water usage within a very small island. It is a matter of urgency, although I accept that we cannot implement it instantly. There must be a lot of careful planning to ensure the outcomes that will deliver the directive's huge benefits.

It was most interesting yesterday to see Folkestone and Dover Water Services Ltd. proposing metered water supply, recognising that we cannot continue to take water without understanding the impact of that. We are looking at the benefits of the water framework directive, which will require rivers, streams, lakes, estuaries and coastal waters to achieve good ecological status by 2015. It is interesting that that is the date when that water company expects 90 per cent. of users to be on metered water. I would expect other water companies to start to take that approach.

I share the views of the hon. Gentleman that we must do much more to manage leakage and water usage, and to recognise their huge threat to the environment. As we always say, our countryside needs to be there not only for our use, but for our children and their children. The work we do now will preserve the heritage for them, start to reverse some of the damage that we and our forebears have done, and start to bring in improvements. That will not be simple, because there is huge pressure on the countryside. We talk about the uses that we make of the countryside—whether we are concerned not to build on it, or whether we want it for leisure access, such as water sports. Those uses have an impact on the countryside, and we must ensure that people get the benefit of the countryside, while understanding that we need to preserve it and that we cannot take a chance on biodiversity.

I had the pleasure of going out with English Nature to look at a site in my constituency—it was almost literally in my backyard, because my home is in the River Wey basin. It was an eye-opener for me to see the diversity of the species on that site, which is being managed to preserve different areas and species such as kingfishers and other birdlife, and deer. It was interesting to see all the different aspects by which we measure the quality of the environment.

There is much work to do. We need to put programmes and measures in place by 2012, and the mechanism for delivery is the river basin management plans. As we have heard, the Government brought the regulations for the transposition of the directive before a Delegated Legislation Committee very late and, as a result, we had little time to debate that important measure. We have concerns about integration of the programme. There are good intentions, but there must also be the means for delivering the environmental improvements that the directive is intended to bring about. We have concerns about the Government's interpretation of the directive and their approach to its implementation. We want to know that the Environment Agency will have the support that it needs to implement the directive, because implementation will not happen without that support. We fear that the Government may take a timidly minimal approach to the directive, both in relation to the environmental improvements and to the public participation that is needed. There must be more flesh on the bones.

The bulk of the duties of regulation are to be carried out by the Environment Agency, and the Minister stated in a Standing Committee that the agency is satisfied with the outcome of its negotiation for the funding settlement. However, he continued:

> "Of course it would like more funding. I understand that and I would like to give it more funding, but we have to work within a budget framework and to a ceiling."—[Official Report, First Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, 27 January 2004; c. 15.]

I do not get the feeling that the Environment Agency is satisfied with the funding. I believe that it will be compromised by insufficient resources in addressing such a demanding agenda.

For once, I will not say to the Minister that I want more and more money to be spent; I recognise the achievements behind the announcements that were made last week about how much money would be made available to the environment. However, we need to start working according to the "polluter pays" principle. We must implement mechanisms to ensure that people who damage the environment pay for its reinstatement.

Mr. Kidney: I have every confidence that the Environment Agency does its job well. The resources that it requires are not just financial; what matters is the skills set and the suite of powers and carrots and sticks that it has to do the job. We need to hear details of those from the Minister.

Sue Doughty: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He put his point concisely, and I support it, as we want to know how the Environment Agency will carry out the work.

Having said that, I reinforce my praise for last week's announcement. Liberal Democrats will always support the Government when they take a strong line on the environment. We heard about several schemes, and the plan to reduce the input of the nutrient phosphorus, which can upset the ecological balance of rivers, into the River Axe in Devon by removing phosphate at local sewage treatment works is just one example of the good work that can be done to bring about a benefit.

However, the Environment Agency wanted the Government to go further, and I should like to know about future plans because we must recognise and protect our heritage. We must consider the problems of diffuse pollution—the nitrates and pesticides that wash into the rivers through farmlands. We sit on committees and it is our responsibility to keep in touch with farmers, so that we all know about the huge problems that they face and the demands that we are putting on them to change how they work through reform of the common agricultural policy and changes to the rural environment. However, we have to find a way for farmers to reduce nitrate use while passing the cost to others so that they can stay in business as conservers of the countryside as well as producers of excellent food and rural products.

We have some concerns about public participation. If we are saying to people that, because of the environment, they cannot do this, cannot build here or must look after that, and that they will have to pay the price in their water bill, we must negotiate with them and explain why we are saying that. Such a dialogue is missing, and consultation is not always the same as involvement. Regulation 12 of the Water Environment (Water Framework Directive) (England and Wales) Regulations 2003 deals with consultation, but we need to know how it will take place. How do the Government envisage the process developing when we want to spend money? How will we have that conversation? I do not want to use the phrase "big conversation" because I feel a little scarred following the recent public debate on genetically modified crops and the subsequent announcement.

We need to ensure that the public can do more. We should be able to tell them our environmental objectives and ask them how they would prioritise and fund them. Could we put out information with water bills to tell the public what we are trying to do for their environment and how we are spending their money? Some places, particularly in the south-west, have had problems with sewage and coastal water, and we should provide much clearer explanations to the public about why their bills have been at such a level. They are ultimately picking up the cost, so we need to consult more.

The same is true with the NFU, as we are asking the farmers to make changes. I have mentioned the costs, but most farmers want to look after the countryside and do the right thing. Consultation should be a two-way process, so that farmers can explain the implications of what we are asking of them and make their own suggestions about how changes can be delivered. We have a problem with regulation 12, as it does not seem to provide a way for farmers to appeal, perhaps in challenging a river basin management plan. The current requirement is only that the Environment Agency should take representations into account. We need a fairer deal with farmers, so that their voice is properly heard. They need to know, point by point, what the problems are.

There were earlier discussions about accountability to Members of Parliament, and some good suggestions were made. I listened to the hon. Member for Salisbury, who has taken time to look at how the plans affect his constituency. We need to do that so that we understand not only the problem as a whole but how it affects our different regions and river basin management plans. We must listen and talk to our constituents, so that we can bring their views into the debate.

In considering how the directive will be implemented, we have one query about bodies of water. The Environment Agency will be responsible for identifying bodies of water with areas of 50 hectares and over, thus excluding all but 12 per cent. of lakes. We cannot include all the smaller bodies of water, but could we do a representative sample of some of them, as with the pilot in the Ribble valley, so that we get a better understanding of the interrelationship of ponds? I learned yesterday from one of the scientists at the marvellous exhibition in the Terrace marquee that there is a huge interrelationship between small lakes and ponds. There is a large regional diversity in the ecology of ponds, almost more than in large lakes and rivers. Pockets of rare species are found in small areas, which is why small water areas are so important. Networks—whether ponds, streams or marshes—must have proximity if they are related ecologies. It would be interesting to see whether we can investigate that further.

We also need to consider further integrating what we are already doing. We need to integrate the water framework directive with the Government's existing commitments to conserve biodiversity through the UK biodiversity action plan. Wetland biodiversity is under pressure. We need that integration, so that we are not picking off one opportunity at a time. We need to do much more. If the biodiversity action plans were to go into the river basin management plans, it would take us a long way forward and give us a much stronger information base.

I know that other Members will have quite a bit to say on this subject, and I am interested to hear what the Minister has to say. I am especially looking forward to hearing his response to several integration points, and to hearing any further announcements that he makes about how the water framework directive will be implemented.

2.52 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on securing the debate. I regret, on his behalf, that it has not been better attended, although the quality of the contributions more than compensates for that. It has been a stimulating debate, of which the image that I shall take away will be that of my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) making a passionate speech in which he told us about paddling in the Avon waters as a youth. I shall remember that fondly.

I should like to impress upon the Minister that things have moved on a little since we last met, when the Opposition prayed against the implementation of certain regulations. I want to tell him how I started off as an early eco-warrior. Hon. Members may have heard a recent Saturday morning Radio 4 programme about green pioneers in a part of the country that I have kept fairly secret until now—although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury said, we know that whatever we say in the confines of Westminster Hall will go no further—where I was brought up in the north of England. On one side of the River Tees, there is County Durham and on the other side is North Yorkshire, which is not far from my present stomping ground.

There was a proposal to strip some water from the River Tees and carry it across to industry in Teesside, making what is now Cow Green reservoir. The reason why I was so interested in that, my first environmental issue, was because it would flood an area that had the only known blue gentians outside the alpine countries of Austria and Switzerland. In spite of huge local opposition, the project went ahead to no purpose whatever. By the time that it was finished and Cow Green reservoir was completed, the industry had secured its water supply from another source, and the project had flooded an area of outstanding natural beauty. Of course, it proved impossible to grow blue gentians outside that area in the north of England, so we no longer have fields of blue gentians. That was the start of my eco-warrior campaigning and the setting of our blue-green agenda several years ago. I was delighted that BBC Radio 4 paid tribute to those early green pioneers in that regard.

As the Minister is aware, we support his aim. In his Department's words:

> "The Water Framework Directive . . . is the most substantial piece of EC water legislation to date."

When we prayed against regulations made under the directive, the Minister asked how the Government could be both early and late in the transposition process. As I was not allowed to answer back on that occasion, may I say that, as the hon. Member for Stafford has suggested, one can be both early and late? One might be one of the first European Union countries to transpose the directive, but the Minister almost missed the deadline. The Minister could be said to have been both early and late on that occasion.

The conclusions on pages 22 and 23 of the Government's response—presumably the Department's response—to the excellent report from the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee on the water framework directive, contain two points on which I want to press the Minister this afternoon. First, the Department said that it was in the way that the regulations are transposed and applied in this country. Precisely how does that proportionality apply, in the Minister's view, to the massive costs that will be inflicted on the farming community through the process, as a number of us have already claimed? Indeed, the Select Committee also argued that point.

> "conscious of the need to ensure proportionality"

The hon. Member for Stafford, in opening the debate, referred to my second point. There is scope for more joined-up government, particularly in land use and land-use planning. I want to place on record my gratitude—I think that the Minister knows of this—for the discussions that I have had with the Environment Agency office in York. Its headquarters are in Clifton moor, but it covers the whole of the region of Yorkshire and the Humber right up to the Scottish border.

I make an urgent plea to the Minister to use the moneys—the rural development moneys in particular—that will become available through reform of the CAP for imaginative flood defence schemes. If he has difficulty thinking of any, perhaps I could have a quiet word with him after the debate this afternoon, as we have identified one in our area. The Ings at Milby island in Boroughbridge are currently flooded because of the lack of compensation. If we can use those funds in an imaginative way to compensate the farmers for the good that they are doing for the rest of the community by shoring up and repairing flood defences, that would be most welcome.

We established the costs when we prayed against the regulations made under the directive. The costs to farm businesses alone are estimated at between £500 million and £3 billion. I have also seen a figure that suggests that the total costs will be much higher. It is estimated in one report in the press—the Minister can reject this figure this afternoon if it is not accurate—that the total cost of implementation has been priced at £9.2 billion.

I also urge the Minister to look favourably at the official Opposition's two early-day motions, and also all who have contributed this afternoon, including the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) who clearly had a pressing engagement, which was perhaps related to the subject matter, and who is not here with us—I shall speak to him later. We have tabled early-day motion 511 on the water framework directive and early-day motion 631 on the groundwater directive, which go over these points. I hope that the Minister will look favourably on them.

How can DEFRA argue and how can the Minister say hand on heart that they are applying the principle of proportionality to the farming community when not only are farmers being asked to pay the costs from the directive, which could be as high as £3 billion, but the regulatory burden of most EU directives falls directly on those farmers? There is the integrated pollution prevention and control directive, the nitrates directive, the groundwater directive that will probably cost £1.2 million to apply, the water framework directive and the fallen stock directive. There is also the proposed pesticides directive—I could go on but time prevents me.

[Miss Anne McIntosh]

A number of hon. Members have already referred to the huge costs of the administrative burden falling on the Environment Agency. I did not get a convincing response from the Minister when we raised that point in the Delegated Legislation Committee that considered the transposing regulations, but enormous burdens are being imposed on the Environment Agency. He will confirm whether those burdens are on top of the other work that the agency is being asked to do. Does he expect the agency to juggle the resources? Will water companies be asked to reimburse the agency direct? How does he imagine that that will be paid for?

Water companies will, as we know, pass the charges on to consumers. I know that that will alarm my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury, who is becoming known as a champion of his constituents in his discussions with Ofwat. It does not seem fair that one category—water companies—can pass on the costs to their customers, who are all of us. That seems particularly unfair on the most vulnerable people, who use water just as the rest of us do. I am thinking particularly of pensioner households and single parent households in which there is only one income earner, bringing up children on their own. How can we ask those people to meet the sizeable increases in their bills? How does the Minister expect farmers to cope when they cannot pass on their costs?

Obviously, the Minister will respond in his own inimitable way to my hon. Friend's question about slicing water off one water source to run it into another watercourse. What are the environmental disbenefits and the costs of that? I should also like to use this opportunity to bring another matter to the Minister's attention. I do not know whether he or the Secretary of State will be asked to rule on this, but the European Commission has apparently been requested, and may agree, to co-fund a highly controversial Spanish hydrological plan, the aim of which is an annual transfer of 1,050 cubic hectolitres of water from Ebro, in Catalunya in the north of the country, to the southern regions. There is deemed to be a mass tourism and intensive agriculture problem, and anyone holidaying in the south of Spain and particularly its islands will be aware of the problems of light rainfall and of getting water to those places. Now that there has been a change of Government in Spain, albeit in highly regrettable circumstances, can the Minister really expect British taxpayers' money to be used to co-fund a hugely expensive hydrological project that will bring no benefits whatever to this country?

I congratulate the hon. Member for Stafford on securing the debate and, in particular, on its timing. I am disappointed that he was unable to join us on and contribute to the Delegated Legislation Committee that considered the transposition and implementation regulations, but there is still time for him and other hon. Members to join us in supporting early-day motions 511 and 631.

Mr. Kidney: The hon. Lady invites us to join her on those early-day motions. Will she join the rest of us who have praised the Minister for the settlement on the guidance in respect of the price review for 2005–10?

Miss McIntosh: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not want to stretch my good relationship with the Minister, but had his Department lost that argument with No. 10, it would have made a complete mockery of everything that the Department has been trying to do on the European water framework directive and the groundwater directive.

The Minister, and indeed the hon. Gentleman, would probably join me in paying tribute to the previous Conservative Government, who were the first to apply the EU drinking water and bathing water directives. I have a little anecdote about that, which I shall save for the next Adjournment debate on this subject. For now, I hope that the Minister will, wherever possible, build on the partnership approach—I prefer the term "partner" to "stakeholder", on which the Government insist—and look to a voluntary approach, particularly with the farming community, to ensure that the principle of proportionality espoused by his Department applies on this issue as it does everywhere else. I hope that the Government will take this opportunity to say that they will move away from what can appear to be a heavy-handed, regulatory and burdensome approach to the transposition, and that they will apply a lighter touch, rather than imposing highly expensive, costly and ineffective burdens on businesses such as farming and water companies, as the Department has done in the past.

3.5 pm

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I join hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on the way in which he presented his case. I support the main thrust of his argument that these are complex and significant issues and that it is necessary to raise awareness about them. I will respond to some of his thoughts on the subject, which were quite good.

I endorse his point that we should lead by example and speak with authority on water management issues. Hon. Members have shown great interest in the matter, especially the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), who has a long-standing interest in water management matters and has spoken about them many times, with a great deal of sense. I do not doubt his enthusiasm and commitment, and I shall say something about the points that he raised in a moment.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned AMP4—the price guidance—and the Minister's recent guidance to the regulator, which was a fair outcome. There are anxieties about costs and we cannot escape that. We have to bear in mind the costs to consumers, but the hon. Gentleman is right: there will be costs if we want improvements. Although consumers want water prices to be kept down, they are very interested in the quality of the water that they receive and in the management of the aquatic environment. Biodiversity in that environment and the improvement of rivers and coasts are popular with the public. It is a matter of getting the balance right.

My hon. Friend asked how the water framework directive fitted into AMP4. In terms of major commitments under that directive, the bulk are likely to fall within the next round of price guidance, AMP5. Nevertheless, there are several aspects of AMP4 that will contribute to the objectives of the water framework directive. They include the freshwater fish directive, for which there is support, and continued improvement in the quality of inland and still waters, especially those that apply to SSSIs. There are several upland pilots on water management involving water companies, which I am keen to see up and running. All of those contribute to achieving the objective of good biological quality water courses.

I accept that agriculture is not responsible for all diffuse pollution and I absolutely accept my hon. Friend's point about the farmers in his constituency. However, we cannot ignore the fact that farms are the biggest contributor in that respect, although there are others, such as the run-off from roads and other point-source pollution that we need to tackle. We need a range of measures involving incentives to deal with diffuse pollution, as my hon. Friend said. Our agri-environment programmes are substantial and the objectives of the review now contain some resource protection, which may involve regulation or financial instruments. They will form part of the consultation on our proposals for tackling diffuse pollution, which will be published towards the end of this month or the beginning of April. My hon. Friend will have the opportunity of seeing those proposals and he may wish to contribute to them.

My hon. Friend talked about involving MPs in consultation in its broader sense, and I agree with that. I like the idea of his proposal of a seminar for hon. Members on the water framework directive; I know that there is a lot of interest in the issue in the House, so I will give his proposal serious thought and consult within the Department to see what we can do about it. I am certainly sympathetic to his case.

The hon. Member for Salisbury made a very good speech. He said that he would speak with some passion, and indeed he did. As a matter of fact, the issue deserves some passion. The hon. Gentleman represents an area that has some wonderful chalk streams and some very delicate biodiversity. He has long championed water extraction issues and long campaigned for the kind of measures that we have now introduced in the Water Act. On the issue of management, he strongly argued that environmental aspects must be part of the price review process. That must be recognised, and we are trying to ensure that that happens.

As regards the abstraction problems in his part of the country, it is inevitable that a serious look will have to be taken at the abstraction licences of some of those involved, and some may have to be withdrawn under the new powers in the Water Act. There are facilities to do that, and the hon. Gentleman, who served on the Committee that considered the Bill, will know how they can be applied.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned Wessex Water's low-flow agreement, and I am in the process of responding to Wessex Water on the issue. Its statement of intent allows for a five-year programme of work and research to assess the effectiveness of measures to restore low flows. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, Wessex Water is only part way through the programme, and some measures are still to be fully implemented, so it is a bit early to reach conclusions about the programme's overall effectiveness. However, the second annual report to Ministers has shown that overall progress is being made in accordance with the statement of intent. The signatories to the statement—the Environment Agency, English Nature, Wessex Water and Ofwat—are monitoring progress. In addition, a consultation group consisting of wider interest groups can follow progress closely and provide input. I know that the hon. Gentleman will support that approach.

Mr. Key: Will the Minister take care to notice whether Wessex Water has any plans to rebuild inadequate infrastructure? Such infrastructure is a major problem in terms of the flooding of sewerage systems in remote rural areas, which often leads to overflowing at sewage treatment works. Will he also consider the issue of phosphorus? As far as I am aware, there is no intention to upgrade sewage treatment works to filter it out.

Mr. Morley: I will certainly be happy to consider those points. I can tell the hon. Gentleman in general terms that the ministerial guidance to the regulator deals with issues such as sewer flooding and asset maintenance. I know from my regular meetings with him that he thinks that those issues are important, and I am sure that they will feature in the Wessex Water plan.

The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that the ministerial guidance covers consultation on research programmes on endocrine disruptors. The problem is important, and its effect on freshwater fish should be taken as a biological indicator of potential problems with pollution in our watercourses. We must understand the problem better and find ways to tackle it. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government absolutely agree with him on the point.

I also agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments on water metering, which, as he will know from my comments in Committee, is our ultimate aim. As far as we are concerned, the more people who move on to water metering, the better. That movement is taking place, and I suspect that it will continue, particularly in the light of the forthcoming price guidance.

I also very much support the hon. Gentleman's comments about the planning considerations involved in sustainable urban drainage and grey water systems. Again, we are giving great thought to the issue, particularly in relation to large new developments such as Thames gateway, which offers the prospect of building in sustainable water and energy management from the beginning. Some good examples of building regulations, development and design are in prospect. We are giving careful consideration to that.

I also listened to the hon. Gentleman's very blunt statements about Ofwat and Water Voice. They have a job to do. I have a great deal of confidence in the regulator. I also meet with Water Voice. Its job is to protect and promote the interests of consumers, so it will pay a great deal of attention to prices. But groups such as Water Voice would also agree that there must be an element of environmental improvement and sustainable management of water resources. That is also in the interests of consumers.

There is common ground. It is a question of striking the right balance, but it is difficult. There are these pressures. I heard the hon. Gentleman's comments about the price reductions last time, and I understand the point that he was making. Nevertheless, we must try to achieve a balance, minimising the cost to consumers while recognising that there are still improvements to be made. That is what we are doing. The final decision on prices is a matter for the regulator, as the hon. Gentleman knows.

[Mr. Morley]

The hon. Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty) talked about the implementation of the directive. It is a major directive and it is being implemented over a number of years. The Environment Agency's budget has increased and it decides how it allocates its resources. It has about 40 staff who are dedicated to working on the water framework directive, and that number is likely to increase in due course as we begin to develop the implementation programme. The Environment Agency has done a very good job with the Ribble valley pilot scheme, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford referred.

I have been up to the Ribble valley myself to talk to the Environment Agency, English Nature and other stakeholders who are working in partnership on this programme. It is one of the aspects of the water framework that I like. I like the partnership approach, the public consultation and the involvement of people and the various interest groups in river basin planning. That is a strength of the directive. There is scope for integrating the points that she mentioned such as planning and biodiversity action plans. It is certainly being done in the Ribble basin. That is a useful lesson for us in how we extend this to other river basin catchment plans.

The hon. Member for Guildford also mentioned the important "polluter pays" principle, which the Government accept. We have to apply it in a proportionate way when considering who bears responsibility for some of the pollution problems that we face. She also mentioned public information and explanation, perhaps extending that to information on water bills. That is a sensible suggestion. It is a matter for the water companies, but I shall certainly bear it in mind.

It would be good to explain to the public how some of the budget has been spent on improvements, which was a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford. We have a good record in this country of improvements in water and coastal quality and in reducing pollution. We should point out the increase in the number of blue flags awarded, as my hon. Friend stated, the improvements in our rivers, which in some cases have been dramatic, and the further steps that have been taken in water management. It is important to stress the desirability of this. I am confident that the public support such issues. Indeed, some of what they pay goes towards that. I emphasise that it is not the largest part of the bill, although I note that some press coverage of the recent ministerial guidance suggested that sticking to green issues was the cause of higher bills.

The environmental programme is about 15 per cent. of the spending programme in relation to the overall price review. The bulk of the money goes to pay for the operation of the companies, and it is divided in various ways—capital assets, maintenance, caps on investment programmes and the other important aspects of delivering quality water. It would be wrong, however, to suggest that water bills will increase simply as a result of further environmental improvements. That is not the case. Although it is a part of the reason, it is entirely defensible.

The hon. Member for Guildford asked about extending the provisions of the water framework directive to smaller areas of water. We can do that, particularly under article 5, whereby we can in due course embrace smaller areas of water. I should like to see that done. The hon. Lady will understand that we want to concentrate on the important wetland areas—they are a priority. However, I do not disagree with her about smaller areas of still water. We can address that under the water framework directive.

The hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) mentioned—

Mr. Kidney: I seek clarification on article 5. In a briefing note, English Nature says that this year's Environment Agency review of what waters will be affected will be binding on the review of river basin management plans in 2009. The agency says that if 88 per cent. of our lakes are left out this year, they will be left out for good. That is not what the Minister is saying.

Mr. Morley: That is not quite my understanding. However, although my hon. Friend is not wrong, we cannot both be right. He is right about the process, but we are using European guidance on small wetlands and biodiversity. The question is how the catchments will protect wetlands both large and small. There is no reason why we cannot consider the matter generally under the article 5 guidance. I should like to go further in due course; the directive has a review period, which will give us the opportunity to consider doing so. I believe that we can deal with small water courses, but the most important thing is to address the river basin catchment plan, taking account of its effect on water in the entire area.

The hon. Member for Vale of York spoke of proportionality in the cost to farmers. I do not disagree; proportionality is the approach that we must take. We must try to be pragmatic and reasonable.

The hon. Lady knows that I am keen on imaginative flood schemes. We have come a long way in recent years in our approach to flood management. We now take a much more integrated and sustainable approach, although we are keen to have soft and hard options for flood defence, or sometimes a combination of the two, and that may involve flooding upland areas. However, I do not rule out compensation if a case can be made for it. Various models of compensation can be provided for landowners. However, landowners who farm on washlands that have traditionally flooded every year because that is the nature of the habitat, and landowners whose land is deliberately flooded as part of a flood management or alleviation scheme, are compensated differently. There is a difference in approach, but we have an open mind and are keen to discuss the matter.

The hon. Lady talked about costings and mentioned a figure of £9 billion. That was a very early figure. The impact assessment is being constantly refined, and we have come a long way from the figure that she gave. Current thinking is that the global figure will be about £450 million to £630 million per annum. Of that figure, the effect on agriculture is estimated as being between £30 million and £210 million. At the moment, these figures should be seen as indicative, not absolute, because I believe that we will refine them further.

Miss McIntosh: Has the Minister been able to discuss the revised figures with the NFU? Will he also report to the House on how the pilot scheme in the Ribble valley is working? As he will know from the name, the vale of York does not have too much upland. Will it only be upland that will benefit from his schemes?

Mr. Morley: Not necessarily, although the hon. Lady may have been referring to some of the schemes mentioned in the price review, which relate to schemes that were proposed by United Utilities Water. They are upland management schemes, but they are fairly worthy, and I would like them to have the necessary financial backing, because they might add to our knowledge of water management and catchment management and make it more holistic. The benefits of the scheme have been costed at about £560 million a year, so the scheme should not be viewed simply as a cost that falls on consumers, companies or farmers. It is worth emphasising that the directive will provide a range of benefits.

The hon. Lady also mentioned the Ebro water scheme, with which I am familiar. I have followed the controversy surrounding it, and sympathise with her remarks. She will know that UK taxpayers are contributing to it, as regional funds are being used, but as a former MEP she will also know that the same applies when we receive regional funding through the contributions made by European taxpayers. Contributions should not be presented as a one-way process.

The hon. Lady may be interested to know that our latest information is that the incoming Spanish Government have announced that they do not propose to go ahead with the Ebro scheme, which is interesting. It is also encouraging, in a way, as Spain has several water resource management schemes in places, such as the Cota Doñana national park, which is an area that I know very well and have taken a close interest in for many years. I understand that the impetus behind the park came from a group of English people who were working with local Spanish people and were very involved in the area. There has therefore been a long involvement in this area of international importance.

Mr. Kidney: If the consultation with farmers on diffuse pollution is delayed beyond the end of March, the Minister's Department gave the Plymouth Western Morning News the wrong date. Will the Minister say whether farmers will be pleasantly surprised by the consultation, or will it be another shocking story of cost?

Mr. Morley: There will be a range of measures under the water framework directive. I cannot guarantee that there will not be costs, but costs are not the only way of dealing with diffuse pollution. It is very important that we consider all the options, some of which may be incentives. We should be imaginative, and take a holistic and integrated approach. That is certainly the view of the House, and I very much welcome the very thoughtful and detailed contributions that have been made today. They add to the Government's commitment to making the directive work effectively.

Wandsworth Council

3.30 pm

Tom Cox (Tooting) (Lab): With the Minister's agreement, I know that my hon. Friends the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) and for Putney (Mr. Colman) hope to catch your eye in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We represent constituencies in Wandsworth, and local organisations in each of our areas will be seriously affected by the reduction of their funding proposed by Wandsworth council. We know Wandsworth council and its policies only too well. It has only one objective: to keep its council tax as low as possible. Although some may welcome that, it deeply harms long-established local organisations that provide a service that is much needed and respected by local people in the communities of Wandsworth. We are talking about one of the richest local authorities in the country. If it truly valued the roles of these organisations, it would be considering not reducing their funding, but increasing it.

Early-day motion 761, which has been signed by more than 50 hon. Members, clearly explains our concerns as MPs for the borough, as well as what the organisations and the people of Wandsworth are saying. In proposing the funding cuts, Wandsworth council is clearly threatening these organisations' very existence. They are organisations that many hon. Members will have in their constituencies and whose value they will know well—citizens advice bureaux, cancer support centres, the Wandsworth bereavement service, the Parkinson's disease service, day centres for the elderly and luncheon clubs. All such organisations are the daily lifeblood of a community. If such groups no longer provide services to local people, who will take over from them? Most certainly, it will not be Wandsworth council. I sought this debate to highlight in the House the deep concerns of local organisations and people in Wandsworth.

I pay the warmest tribute to the local Wandsworth newspapers: the Wandsworth Borough News and the Wandsworth Guardian. For many weeks, they have given these issues a great deal of coverage. Their reporters have not sat in their offices waiting for someone to phone them, but visited the local organisations to which I referred to meet and talk to the people who run them, and the people of Wandsworth who use their services and most certainly want them to continue. Local people's views and concerns have very clearly been reported in the local press. In the Wandsworth Guardian on 12 February, Petra Griffiths, the cancer resource centre director, said:

> "This grant is essential as it enables us to function. It seems the council wants to keep their council tax low and have selected schemes like ours for grant cuts that they call low priority. We don't think we come within that category."

How right she is. Do any of us think that a cancer centre that supports and gives advice to patients and their families is a low priority?

Gladys Whigham, who runs the local branch of the Parkinson's Disease Society, said that the proposed cut would leave it with only nine months' funding for a welfare visitor who gives advice and helps its 50 members with benefit claims. She said:

> "Unless we can find funding elsewhere—and everyone is looking for funding from elsewhere—we would be making our people pay for their care. That is not providing a service."

[Tom Cox]

That lady's comments amount to a statement of a clear case. People who need care are often retired people who cannot work because of illness. It is not acceptable to my parliamentary colleagues or to me that such people should be told, "If you want care or services, pay for them." What angers me and many people in Wandsworth is that that is happening in one of the richest local authorities in the country.

Mo Smith runs a luncheon club that is also under threat. She says that it has

"members who have been isolated for up to a year at a time, who have had no real contact with people. We have given them a new lease of life since they have been here."

All Members of the House will fully understand and agree with what she says. Peter Cardy of Macmillan Cancer Relief sums up the matter clearly:

"Less than two years ago, the flagship Conservative council in Wandsworth was so flush with cash that it saw fit to cut its council tax by £50 for a typical band D household. By pure coincidence, this happened just before the London local elections. Apparently, it didn't need the money.

But people living with cancer do need it now. The pre-election savings Wandsworth found could have funded its grant to the excellent Wandsworth Cancer Resource centre alone more than 30-times over."

That is the key to the issue—saving money. It does not matter who will be affected if council tax can be kept low and large sums can be built up in the reserves for elections. My hon. Friend the Minister will be fully aware of the very substantial funding that the Government give to Wandsworth year by year. The debate will clearly show him how Wandsworth council uses some of that funding not as he, I, my colleagues or the people of Wandsworth would expect, but to build up its reserves.

As early-day motion 761 states, there is a very urgent need for discussions with Wandsworth council about why, as one of the richest boroughs in the country, it is cutting funding to key local organisations. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister urgently to demand such a meeting.

3.39 pm

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Tom Cox) for securing the debate and providing me with the welcome chance to add a few words to his about the performance and practice of Wandsworth borough council. I appreciate that the Minister is not responsible for the council's policies. That is just as well, because if he were, I do not think that he would sleep easy in his bed. However, Wandsworth's recent actions must make him question its performance and practice. The authority was described only two years ago as excellent, but now, sadly, it is short-sighted and self-defeating.

The cutting of the grant to the cancer resource centre, which my hon. Friend mentioned, is particularly self-defeating, since it is recognised as a pioneering organisation in providing support and home visiting for cancer patients. I attended its 20th anniversary reception last year in the Commons, which was attended by the Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett) and the chairman of the all-party cancer group, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who gave enthusiastic tributes to the Wandsworth campaign as a prototype for local cancer groups. At a similar event attended by Wandsworth councillors, Conservatives lined up to say how much they admired the organisation, but they have now voted to withdraw its grant. The centre will have to close if the grant is withdrawn. It is used to pay for rent and key staff to run it, and there is no alternative way of paying the rent.

I am more concerned about the knock-on effect of withdrawing the grant, which will place a larger burden on the council's statutory responsibilities, costing it more than is saved by not making the grant. There will be more demands on social services and the national health service. The same applies to the cut in Wandsworth's bereavement service; it also does a fantastic job in the prevention field, which is reflected by many letters that I have received.

The council also tried to justify the closure of pensioners' luncheon clubs, saying that they are aimed at a younger and more able section of the older population. However, anyone who has visited the clubs will know that it is often such clubs that keep elderly people more active and mobile. I will read one paragraph from a letter that I received from a pensioner in my constituency:

"The luncheon club is a window into the outside world for many a pensioner who will, after leaving the club, spend the rest of the day and night without seeing or talking to another human being . . . Try to picture yourself alone in an empty room, hoping that somebody will call; then the phone rings and one of your mates from the luncheon club says, 'Don't forget, it's roast beef tomorrow. See you there'."

That is the kind of organisation that will have to close.

Even more destructive is the decision not to passport £529,000 to Wandsworth's schools, which follows a refusal last year not to passport £1.7 million to the schools budget. It is not as if Wandsworth is hard done by. The Government gave it £227 million this year and rely on the council to match the increase in education funding. However, the Government fund about 84 per cent. of Wandsworth's spending, which is one of the highest percentages in the country, while the council refuses to pay its share of the schools budget.

The refusal to passport might be understandable if Wandsworth had the highest education spending, but it has the lowest spending per secondary pupil in inner London in the current year, and it will do so again in future. Its refusal to match the Government's investment in education is appalling. It is taking away from the schoolchildren of Wandsworth £500,000 this year and £2.2 million in all, which it was given to invest in their education.

Wandsworth used the excuse that those cuts were necessary because the Government threatened to use their powers to cap the council tax if the council tried to increase the tax above a certain amount. That excuse is now seen as disingenuous and misleading, because there was never any likelihood that the Government would use their powers to cap Wandsworth and, in any case, it emerged three days later that Wandsworth had no intention of increasing council tax by anything like the amount that would have risked its being capped. Indeed, the council announced a zero increase in its spending. It is total bunk for Wandsworth to try to blame the Government. The cuts are entirely the responsibility of the leadership of Wandsworth council, and they are not being carried out in any way at the behest of the Government.

More serious than that is the element of bad faith. On 1 January, Wandsworth promised in its indicative schools budget to passport the full amount to the schoolchildren of Wandsworth, with the proviso that it reserved the right to reconsider if material conditions changed. It then announced earlier this month that it would passport not the full amount, but only 93 per cent., and retain the remaining £500,000. However, it is not true that any material changes have occurred. The authority simply tried to mislead the Government into not using their powers under the Education Act 2002 and then changed its mind. That must have been in its mind the whole time, because it was the only party that knew what the council tax rise was likely to be.

I argue that the Government still have powers under the Education Act 2002 to force Wandsworth to passport the full amount. I know that it is after 14 January, but it is less than a fortnight since the announcement that the authority did not intend to passport the full amount. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to speak to his colleagues in other Departments, and especially the Department for Education and Skills, to remind them that they still have the legal power to use their right.

The future of schoolchildren in the London borough of Wandsworth is at stake. I do not criticise the schools, but I do criticise the council, which is vested with responsibility for education, for withholding money that was paid by the Government to be spent on the children of Wandsworth. The council is retaining that money for political reasons. The Government are beholden to use their powers to ensure that the money finds the recipients for whom it is intended.

3.46 pm

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Tom Cox) on securing the debate, and I agree with every word that he and my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) said. I also welcome the Minister, who grew up in Battersea and went to school in Putney at Southfields school, Wandsworth, where he was head boy. The school was closed by the Conservatives and reopened under a Labour Government as St. Cecilia's, Wandsworth. I am pleased that my son is a pupil at that school.

Having started on that light note, I, too, wish to express my sadness at the loss of the regenerate.com luncheon club, headed by Mo Smith in Roehampton, and the Ashburton and Arndale luncheon clubs. Those clubs are a lifeline to many older people in the community and it is essential that Wandsworth continue to fund them.

My hon. Friends did not mention the cut of some £215,000 in the budget for the citizens advice bureaux, which led to the closure of the Putney CAB, a lifeline for my constituents who need legal advice. I support what has been said about those Wandsworth-wide groups, to which the constituents of all three hon. Members who have spoken in the debate have access. I am very proud of the cancer resource centre, which is a world centre, but that pride does not extend to Wandsworth council. Funding for the bereavement service is going, and so is funding of the local Parkinson's disease service, which will be a real loss. The council has very large reserves that could fund the groups, and it could restore tomorrow what is being cut if the Minister spoke to the leader of the authority and told him what was going on.

I echo the concern expressed about the shortfall in the schools budget; it was £1 million last year and it is £1 million this year. I understood that Wandsworth was the one council in London that was not passporting its money, but this afternoon I received a letter from Sir Jeremy Beecham stating that Wandsworth is the one council in the UK that is refusing to passport the money. That is an extraordinary situation, and as Sir Jeremy said, it completely undermines the concept of local authorities having a role in education funding.

Like my hon. Friends, I have long queues at my surgery of people who are concerned about what is happening in Wandsworth council. They are worried about housing repairs and about the diminishing level of social housing. The council has made no attempt to deal with the housing shortfall in the area, and that is something that the Minister should become involved in.

Wandsworth is very proud of its rank as an excellent council and it is important to take that on board. It is interesting to read what it says on its website about the corporate assessment:

> "Communication of the council's priorities is exemplary. Universally, and with whatever degree of support or concern, stakeholders and partners reported that one of the key strengths of the council is the sharp clarity of its priorities and what it will and will not do."

We are talking about what the council will not do. On "Focus", the assessment says:

> "The council is not distracted by the need to address sudden unexpected crises."

The council has

> "good intelligence, a clear picture of what matters, and a good early warning system for future issues."

Might I suggest that Wandsworth has not lived up to the billing that the Audit Commission gave? I would support "CPA—The Way Forward", in which the commission said:

> "We are continuing to have discussions with central and local government stakeholders about the approach to be adopted in the case of 'excellent' councils whose services slip."

Services are slipping in Wandsworth.

The officers in Wandsworth are brilliant. They do all they can to keep services going. I asked one senior officer, who has since retired, why he remained at Wandsworth. He said, "If I left, the cuts would be deeper, the services would get worse." I look forward to seeing the Minister intervening where the services are slipping.

3.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Tom Cox) on securing this debate. I also congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Putney (Mr. Colman) and for Battersea (Martin Linton) on their forthright support for the passionate contribution that my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting made on behalf of his constituents, the voluntary and community organisations in the borough and the schools whose the pupils and parents are so anxious about the problems that they face. I note that my hon. Friend's name is at the top of early-day motion 761, for which he has garnered wide support—

[Phil Hope]

3.52 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.5 pm

On resuming—

Phil Hope: Before I was interrupted, I was saying that my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting had his name at the head of an early-day motion that describes his very substantial concerns. I see the signatures of 53 other hon. Members who support him, and my hon. Friends the Members for Putney and for Battersea have supported him today in expressing concern about the decisions that Wandsworth council has taken about its council tax. Having grown up and gone to school in the area, as my hon. Friend the Member for Putney reminded us, I am sad that today's debate on Wandsworth should be about difficulties and negativity.

On 5 February, Parliament approved the local government settlement for 2004–05—the next financial year—which provides a generous grant increase of 5.5 per cent. and an overall increase of 7.3 per cent. Since taking office, the Government have increased funding by 30 per cent. in real terms. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting noted at the beginning of the debate the Government's support for local government. That contrasts rather starkly with the 7 per cent. real-terms cut made over the last four years under the Conservative Government. As a former county councillor who had to deal with huge budget cuts as a result, I know how much local government has benefited from the past seven years of Labour Government.

In the recent grant settlement, we reduced the ring-fenced grant from more than 13.3 per cent. to about 11 per cent. of the total grant. That is part of our overall commitment to reverse the trend on the ring-fencing of grants to local authorities.

We have always said that there is no need for excessive council tax rises. I shall come to the Wandsworth point in a second. We said that, given the generous settlement for next year, we expected to see council tax increases in low single figures, and we are encouraged by the evidence that many councils have listened to our exhortations to lower their council tax increases. A general point is that we have targeted capping powers and we will use them as necessary. We will decide on capping principles when we have received and examined the final detailed budgets from all councils. We will not cap for the sake of it, but we will cap to prevent taxpayers being subjected to excessive rises.

I shall now focus on the funding and council tax increases in Wandsworth. In the financial year 2002–03, Wandsworth received a 4 per cent. increase in funding. In 2003–04, there was a 3.5 per cent. increase, and in 2004–05, Wandsworth council will receive £227 million in grant—an increase of almost £9 million or 4.1 per cent.

Apart from the general grant funding, Wandsworth is receiving substantial further funding from the Government for 2004–05. That includes £12 million from the Department for Education and Skills, £5.7 million from the Department of Health and £400,000 of neighbourhood renewal funding. Wandsworth received £400,000 of e-government funding in 2002–03 and 2003–04, and it can expect further substantial support for e-government in 2004–05.

Now let us consider Wandsworth's council tax increases for the same period. In 2002–03—an election year—the borough had a council tax increase of minus 25 per cent. In 2003–04—after the election—it had an increase of 57 per cent., and for 2004–05, the increase is 0 per cent. I leave hon. Members to draw their own conclusions on Wandsworth's financial management, given that track record of council taxes, but I would like to draw my hon. Friends' attention to two contributions made to the debate from other quarters. They may have seen a letter sent by my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards to the leader of Wandsworth borough council about school funding and passporting into the schools budget. My hon. Friend said:

"At our meeting earlier today you made a number of assertions about the possibility of budget-capping in 2004–05 and said that in the light of those concerns you are proposing no increase in the council tax rate and passporting at only 93.7 per cent."

"I have spoken to Nick Raynsford"— my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government—

"and can give you that reassurance: as Nick Raynsford has made clear on a number of occasions, where Councils set a council tax increase in low single figures they will not be capped. I understand that Wandsworth could passport in full with a council tax increase of some 2 per cent. There is therefore no case for Wandsworth to break their promise to passport the full SFSS increase to schools, as the risk of capping does not exist. You said that you were committed to education and funding your schools. You have the opportunity to make that commitment a reality."

I read that out in full because it demonstrates that the Government are not happy with a council that decides not to passport 100 per cent. of a grant to schools.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea asked about the legal powers to enforce passporting. Regrettably, we can act only when the council considers the proposed schools budget inadequate, and we must act within 14 days of the 31 December deadline. We have passed that deadline and are therefore unable to use the powers to which he referred.

I hope that my response has made the Government's position clear. I also draw Members' attention to a letter sent by Sir Jeremy Beecham, who is chairman of the Local Government Association, to the council leader. He also sent a copy to the Government and the media. He said:

"I am bound to say that it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that political games are being played."

That is the case, and we are deeply concerned.

Budgetary decisions, including on the funding of voluntary bodies, are a matter for individual local authorities, because of the nature of the democratic structures in this country. Therefore, any cuts that Wandsworth borough council makes in its grants to voluntary organisations in Wandsworth are a matter for that council. However, I point out that Wandsworth, like every other council, is accountable to its electorate for its spending decisions. I make that point—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Edward O'Hara: Order. We must now turn our attention to pigswill.

Pigswill

4.13 pm

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): On 24 May 2001, three months after the outbreak of foot and mouth, there entered into force the Animal By-Products (Amendment) (England) Order 2001. At the stroke of a bureaucrat's pen in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, there perished in this country a practice that has taken place for thousands of years, ever since mankind domesticated animals—the feeding of food waste to pigs in the form of swill feed.

I know that Members on both sides of the House want to contribute in this short debate, so I do not propose to waste time by disputing the logic of that decision, although I believe that it was illogical to penalise innocent swill feeders for the irresponsible behaviour of one, who may or may not have been implicated in the outbreak of foot and mouth. I hold out no hope that the Minister will do the right thing and revoke the ban, but it is right to draw his attention to its adverse effects, which, like so many pieces of regulation, is adding to the costs of business and industry.

To take one example, Phyllis Court hotel in Henley must now pay an extra £1,000 a year to a licensed collector, whose responsibility is to remove wet waste that previously went to a pigswill feeder. Given that there is room for only three years' waste in our landfill sites, that is not the cleanest and greenest solution. It is estimated that the ban on swill feeding is generating an extra 1.7 million tonnes of waste per year, and that which does not fill up our landfill sites must be going down our drains, clogging up the sewers and attracting vermin.

Yet of all the people who are suffering the ill effects of the ban, the worst hit are the 62 previously licensed swill feeders. It is the injustice to them on which I shall concentrate. I will show that the Government have been triply culpable in their behaviour towards the swill feeders and therefore owe them compensation. There is the simple moral case: many swill feeders were urged by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to buy very expensive equipment and a few months later that machinery, like their profession, was redundant.

The Minister for the Environment said last week in the House that he would not compensate the 62 swill feeders for this Government-imposed frustration of their Government-inspired expectations on the principle that the Government do not compensate for the introduction of health and safety measures. He cited in support of his actions the Tory Government's refusal to compensate those who de-boned the heads of animals when that practice was banned during the BSE crisis.

Hansard records how in 1996 the hon. Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), now the Minister for the Environment, clamoured for compensation for the head de-boners saying that the Government had a moral duty to compensate them. Someone has changed his tune. I expect the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will invoke the prerogative of government to hypocrisy, to say one thing in opposition and to do another in government. He will brush aside the moral obligation that I believe is on him and his Government. I must warn him that they face a far more difficult legal challenge. Government negligence created the conditions in which the foot and mouth outbreak became more likely and the innocent 62 swill feeders were made more likely to suffer for the Government's negligence.

It is now obvious that at the time of the outbreak the UK Government were in material breach of article 15, paragraph 3, of EU council directive 80/217/EEC, in that the UK's Animal By-Products Order 1999 allowed "the consigning of swill from premises approved for the processing and feeding swill to other holdings".

Now the EU directive did not ban swill feeding—far from it. In fact the Minister may have inadvertently misled the House when he said that it had been banned across Europe, because it will continue in Germany, Italy and Austria until at least 2006. It might have continued here if Ministers had had more gumption and had stood up for the industry in this country.

The EU directive demanded a more stringent regime than that imposed in Britain, and it could be argued—I should warn the Minister that it will be argued when the matter comes to adjudication by the courts—that the UK Government's lax implementation of the directive created the conditions in which irresponsible and unhygienic swill feeding, of the kind we saw at Bobby Waugh's farm at Heddon-on-the-Wall, was more likely. That made the outbreak of foot and mouth more likely and the innocent swill feeders more likely to be punished for the crimes of the guilty few.

I need hardly remind the Minister, who I am sure is an expert in European law, that under the Francovich ruling the European Court of Justice laid down the principle of state liability for damage caused to individuals by breaches of community law, giving rise to an obligation on that state to make good such damage. Even if, as I hope will not be the case, the Minister does not accept that he and his Government have a moral duty or any legal obligation under Francovich principles, there is the simple moral point that the UK Government failed adequately to enforce their own regulations, never mind EU regulations.

A report by the EU Commission conducted from 1 to 5 October 2001 not only highlighted the legal discrepancies, but found that two former swill feeders were failing to comply with the Animal By-Products Order 1999. The report pointed out that "insufficient hygiene standards have allowed for the contamination of clean areas by unclean waste".

In other words, it found that the UK Government were not sufficiently enforcing their own Animal By-Products Order, never mind implementing the EU directive correctly.

The clinching point in my case is that made by Mr. Jim Dring, the state veterinary officer responsible for reviewing Bobby Waugh's licence a mere 14 days before the index case of foot and mouth disease appeared on his farm. In a statement dated 5 Oct 2001, Mr. Dring accepted that had his inspection

"been more rigorous than it was, had the licence not been renewed, or renewed subject only to radical revision of Waugh's patently deficient feeding technique, then this awful 2001 foot and mouth epidemic would never have come about."

There could be no clearer admission by the emanations of the state of failure adequately to police their own regulations, nor could it be clearer that, had the state done its duty properly, there would have been no need to ban an innocent and ancient practice.

That is the moral and the legal case for treating those 62 swill feeders well, rather than just brushing them contemptuously aside—as the Minister has been tempted to do in the past—as people engaged in a sordid and mildly amusing activity, which is unlikely to command public support. They may be involved in a mucky business, but that is no reason to treat them like muck.

We must err on the side of caution in the agriculture sector, but my case is that the disaster took place precisely because the Government did not err on the side of caution in implementing the directive and enforcing the law; they must bear the responsibility for that.

I urge the Minister to consider how his Department's money will be best spent—in lodging lawyers in Luxembourg to fight a case in which the Government do not occupy the moral high ground, and which is, at best, legally uncertain, or in doing the right thing by the representatives of an ancient British industry who have been done out of a job through no fault of their own.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) on securing a debate on an important subject. He may have over-egged his pudding in terms of the politics, but the basic point that he makes is correct.

Two potential issues are at stake that should be explored thoroughly and properly in the debate and by the Government, but that has not yet happened. The first issue is whether there has been a failure in policy or procedure by the Government. One incident triggered a ban that affected every swill feeder in the UK. The incident was serious, and it may be the case, although there is some dispute about it, that that incident triggered off the whole problem with foot and mouth disease. However, all swill feeders suffered the consequence of that one lapse. The decision was rushed through in a matter of days—there was no proper consultation, compensation or consideration of the effect that it would have on those swill feeders' livelihoods.

Mark Prescot and his brother were pig farmers in Melling in my constituency. They are not pig farmers any more. They had spent quite a lot of money on the correct equipment, but they were then prevented from engaging in that activity and were given no compensation for the money that they had invested in the equipment. I contend either that the Government were unfair or that they overreacted. If they overreacted, there is a case for maladministration. I have referred Mark Prescot's case to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration—several other hon. Members have referred similar cases to him—and he will determine whether there has been maladministration. I believe that there has, but will await his verdict.

However, even allowing for the fact that that investigation is under way, the policy was unfair. Comparisons can be made with deep-sea fishermen and mink farmers, all of whom were compensated for having to disengage from the industries in which they were involved. However, no serious consideration was given to the pig farmers. The most that Mark Prescot got was a helpful consultant who looked at his land and the activities in which he was engaged and concluded that he could not think of anything else that he could do except put in a fishing pond. That was helpful, although Mark Prescot realistically decided that charging people to use a fishing pond might not be the most economic use of his land. That is the only assistance that he received.

Among all the problems in my constituency—yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is situated next door to mine and suffers from similar difficulties—it may seem strange for me, as an urban MP, to be taking up this one. However, the fact is that my constituent has lost his livelihood and has not been compensated in any way. That is almost unprecedented. I cannot remember any other industry that has, in effect, been destroyed without any consideration of compensating those involved for the loss of their livelihood. It is quite possibly a case of maladministration—that remains to be seen—but it is most certainly a strong case of unfairness.

4.26 pm

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Ind Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) on introducing this important debate. I was involved with the issue in 2001, when I received representations from Mrs. Lynda Davies of the Association of Swill Users. As a result, I met Mrs. Davies and the Rev. Keith Ineson of the Salvation Army's agricultural chaplaincy in Cheshire to discuss the severe difficulties experienced by swill users. I pay tribute to Keith Ineson for his valuable work during the foot and mouth epidemic, and I am sorry to hear that he has been made redundant: he is the last agricultural chaplain in the United Kingdom.

In November 2001, Keith Ineson reported to me that 41 farmers in Cheshire, most of whom were tenants and had no alternative business or accommodation, were in dire straits, placing many families under great stress. Mr. Ineson reported to me that one elderly farming couple were then living on an income of just £100 a month. I remain concerned that the manner in which the ban on pigswill was implemented by DEFRA paid insufficient attention to the practicalities faced by the majority of farmers using pigswill, in addition to the detrimental way in which the ban impacted on pig farmers' livelihoods.

The decision to introduce a ban was based on the evidence derived from a single case of pigswill use, which was then considered to have been the source of the outbreak of foot and mouth disease, rather than on the usual methods of collection, storage, processing and distribution used generally by pig farmers in the United Kingdom. The feeding of catering waste to pigs was subject to a host of stringent rules and regulations, to which farmers working under licence firmly adhered, and Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food inspectors visited farms every three months. The failure was due to the lack of inspection, and not to the pigswill users.

There were particularly difficult circumstances pertaining to animal husbandry in the United Kingdom at that time, and DEFRA instituted an extremely brief period of consultation in which interested parties could participate. Even with meaningful consultation, the Department's stringent proposals were not amended as a result of the limited number of representations received during that short period. As a direct result of the ban, a considerable number of small businesses, each feeding an average of 1,500 pigs, were lost. These farmers were given a maximum of 10 days' notification in which to finish feeding pigs completely or to adapt their plants to take alternative feeding methods. Both options were totally unreasonable and unworkable, given the time factor involved.

I do not want to take any more time, except to make the point that in Europe, pigswill continues in Austria, Germany and Italy, those countries having obtained a derogation until 2006. They are more fortunate than the 62 swill users who, at the stroke of a bureaucrat's pen, were put out of business in this country. If justice is to be done, they should be compensated.

4.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) on securing this debate.

It may be helpful if I put the debate on pigswill into its historical context. Legislation controlling the feeding of waste food to animals is not new. In the 1940s, there were a number of swill-related orders, including the Diseases of Animals (Boiling of Animal Foodstuffs) Order 1947 and the Foot and Mouth Disease (Disinfection of Road Vehicles) Order 1941, which was introduced during the war. Since then, the controls have been progressively strengthened in recognition of the risks of feeding food waste to animals and with the aim of trying to avoid outbreaks of serious diseases such as foot and mouth and classical swine fever. Significant among those were the orders of 1954, 1973, 1987 and 1999.

Until recently, swill feeding was considered a useful way to dispose of waste food, provided that the legislative requirements were strictly adhered to. What made us review that practice? In 2001 we had the worst outbreak of foot and mouth disease in living memory. Following the outbreak, the risks from swill feeding became much greater. Before the outbreak, the main risk was from the feeding of imported infected meat products. Afterwards, there was a much greater risk of infectivity from domestically produced meat because of the amount of virus in circulation. That is why we introduced the ban when we did, in order to reduce the risk of foot and mouth spreading. After the introduction of the UK ban, the European Commission proposed an EU-wide ban on swill feeding of waste food to livestock. We supported the continuation of that ban, which now applies across the Community, with Germany and Austria, and not Italy, granted a four-year transitional phase-out period.

Perhaps the hon. Member for Henley opposed the ban in the first place, but he suggested that after foot and mouth we should have reintroduced swill feeding, but with stricter controls. We were not prepared to do so, and the Anderson inquiry into foot and mouth recommended that we should not do so.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): Since the Minister has mentioned the Anderson inquiry, perhaps he can deal with the one point that I wished to make. My hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) has brought the issue forward and we have all had sight of Mr. Dring's full report. However, that report was not available to the Anderson inquiry. The Secretary of State has admitted that, although the report was available to Ministers, they chose not to make it available to Anderson. It is clear to anyone who has read the report that it is pertinent to foot and mouth. In the light of the new evidence now in the public domain, will the Minister reconvene the Anderson committee to see what lessons should be learned from that important document?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I shall not do that, but I shall address the genuine concern that the hon. Lady raises.

The origin for the 2001 outbreak is considered to have been at Burnside farm, Heddon-on-the-Wall, Northumberland, which was licensed to feed processed waste food under the Animal By-Products Order 1999. Burnside farm was permitted to obtain processed waste food from approved premises. Following the outbreak, evidence was found of unprocessed waste food having been fed to pigs at Burnside farm. That is the most likely source of infection of the pigs.

As hon. Members have said, in recent days there has been highly misleading and mischievous press coverage based on selective quoting of a personal statement made by the local MAFF vet, Jim Dring, in autumn 2001 about his contacts with the Waughs' farm in the run-up to the outbreak. I have decided today to publish Mr. Dring's personal testimony in full, so that people can read it and make up their own minds. A copy has been placed in the Library and on the DEFRA website. Far from showing any incompetence on the part of Mr. Dring or the then MAFF part, I believe that the document shows a dedicated and conscientious vet dealing with some difficult customers who went out of their way to conceal dangerous and illegal activity on their farm. To suggest, as some have done, that Mr. Dring was responsible for the foot and mouth outbreak is like saying that a police officer who misses a piece of evidence at the scene of a crime is responsible for that crime rather than the criminal himself.

Ann Winterton: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I shall not do so any more.

There has also been some confusion about the EU directive that governed the feeding of pigswill at the time, which the hon. Member for Henley mentioned. The directive permitted the treatment of swill in specialised establishments under official control and provided for such swill to be consigned from those establishments to approved premises. It states:

"Member States may authorize the treatment of swill in specialized establishments equipped for the purpose, on which there are no animals and which are under official control. In this case, by way of derogation from paragraph 2, the swill may, after heat-treatment, also be used for the feeding of pigs other than fattening pigs, provided that its distribution and use are controlled so as to avoid any risk of the swine fever virus spreading".

In my Department's view, our legislation fully implemented the provisions of the directive. Consigning properly processed swill from approved premises to approved swill feeders was, at that time, a legitimate activity, and it was permitted under the directive.

Mr. George Howarth: Does my hon. Friend accept that my constituent Mark Prescot, for example, complied fully with those regulations and yet was stopped from using swill feed and therefore lost his livelihood? Does that not deserve compensation?

Mr. Bradshaw: That was very unfortunate for my hon. Friend's constituent, but I will come to the issue of compensation in a short while.

As I said, the introduction of the Animal By-Products Order 1999 provided more stringent controls than ever before. However, experience demonstrated that no matter how stringent the legislation, there will be those who will do not follow the rules. In the case of foot and mouth disease, which cost the country approximately £8 billion, that had catastrophic consequences. There is only one conclusion to be drawn: the Government made the right decision in banning the feeding of swill to pigs.

I turn now to the issue of compensation, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth). I fully appreciate that the introduction of the ban affected a group of producers that combined two roles—waste collector and pig farmer. In the past, Governments have not compensated farmers for changes in feed material available for their livestock. The ban did not prevent those affected from keeping pigs, although I accept that some farmers may have faced additional costs to adapt their feeding systems.

Pig producers, including former swill feeders, may continue to feed their livestock vegetable or bread waste or liquid feed that neither contains the banned products nor has originated from a kitchen or other premises where meat has been handled. Equally, the business of waste food collection could continue provided that no livestock are kept on the premises to which the waste was taken. In those circumstances, the waste would have to be disposed of by the collector at an approved disposal site.

My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East made comparisons with other sectors—the fishing and mink farming industries. The ban on mink farming prevented producers from farming mink, whereas the ban on swill feeding did not prevent the keeping of pigs. As I stated, it is not Government policy to compensate farmers for changes in the feed material available for their livestock and it would not be appropriate to start that now. The announcement made by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment in April 2001 about a £22.5 million package of aid to the fishing industry was not about compensation; it was an encouragement to adopt more sustainable fishing practices and to rationalise the industry through decommissioning.

The Government did, however, assist swill feeders in other ways. Free business advice from professional consultants was made available to all registered swill users and processors. Our records show that there were 93 of these, and I am aware that the reaction of those that took part was mixed, but it was a major effort to provide practical assistance.

Other opportunities were available, such as the rural enterprise scheme to help diversification, details of which have been made available to those campaigning on behalf of the swill feeders. I consider that the Government have not only gone to considerable lengths to listen to the concerns of former swill feeders, but done what they can to make available practical assistance to help overcome the difficulties that the ban may have caused individual businesses.

Mr. Boris Johnson: Will the Minister specify exactly what practical help the Government have given to those swill feeders and why it cannot be extended to compensation for the machinery in which they have invested considerable sums?

Mr. Bradshaw: As I said, such compensation would set a precedent. The practical help is what I have just outlined: free business advice and help to encourage the swill feeders to diversify and to stay in business.

The hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) made a point about the consultation. The reason why the consultation period was brief was that we were in the middle of a foot and mouth outbreak. There were a good number of responses to the consultation. The overwhelming majority of organisations, including the National Farmers Union, the National Pig Association, the National Consumer Council and the Meat and Livestock Commission, supported the Government's decision to ban feeding pigswill to pigs.

Ann Winterton: They replied as they did because they were unaware that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, or MAFF as it was, had failed to inspect the premises in question. MAFF, not the pigswill user, was the true culprit.

Mr. Bradshaw: I do not accept that at all. When the hon. Lady reads Jim Dring's report in full, she will reach the same conclusion that I reached, which is that the culprit was a farmer—

Ann Winterton rose—

Mr. Bradshaw: I shall not give way. The culprit was a farmer who was indulging in a dangerous and illegal activity, and Mr. Dring made every effort to do his job properly when he made his January visit. No one has suggested that he was negligent or that he missed important evidence. It is very easy for hon. Members to say in hindsight that the activity was obvious. It was not. I suggest that the hon. Lady reads the verbatim report made when Mr. Dring visited the farm in January.

The hon. Member for Henley also expressed concern that the ban has increased the amount of waste going to landfill. That needs to be put into context. When the ban was introduced, the number of pigs fed on swill amounted to approximately 1.5 per cent. of the national herd, which is very few pigs. The amount of waste food being used to feed pigs was not great compared with the amounts of waste food going to landfill from other sources. However, the Government take their recycling targets seriously and are aware that the amount of biodegradable waste sent to landfill must be reduced, not increased. DEFRA strongly supports the option of composting and the biogas treatment of catering wastes. Those plants must be approved under the animal by-products regulation. Given that that legislation was introduced only recently, we have been doing well in dealing with applications for approval. To date, 10 plants are being validated and are now treating catering waste.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eighteen minutes to Five o'clock.

National Offender Management Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

9.30 am

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I am grateful to have the opportunity to introduce such an important debate. This is the first time that we have had the chance to discuss the new national offender management service. No one would disagree that improvements must be made to the way in which offenders are managed. That is not to say that some progress has not been made. In their response to the Carter report, the Government had a lot to say about improvements, such as the policies that have been adopted in prisons to deal with mental health and drug abuse. This year, 50,000 prisoners will be subject to clinical detoxification, which is an enormous improvement on what was happening a few years ago. As for education, I think that 50,000 prisoners will gain basic skills qualifications this year.

Significant improvements have been made. The percentage of prisoners who are in work or training compared with a few years ago has improved enormously. We all recognise that progress has been made but there are still some problems. We must bear in mind two key issues: first, the number of people in prison, which is far too high and is still rising and, secondly, the reoffending rates, which do not show any great signs of coming down.

Although there have been improvements, there have been worrying shortfalls in some parts of the country. I am thinking in particular of the probation service in London, which has significant resource problems, and the capability of the service to do the work that it should be doing. I shall cite a recent example. An offender was leaving prison after a fairly short sentence, but there were problems with completing his probation report. No one was available to undertake such necessary work.

Although we shall be discussing the structures of the service this morning, there are clearly resource implications. We must consider what resources are available. The services are overstretched and, if we do not examine resources, we will not solve the problem. In the past two or three years, there has been a tendency not to use the extra money that has been put into the service to fund front-line services. There have been large increases in bureaucracy at national level within the probation service but, as I said, money has not gone into front-line issues.

There are two stated aims of NOMS: first, to punish offenders appropriately and, secondly, to reduce reoffending. As for the structure that is proposed, Martin Narey has been appointed to head the service. There will be 10 regional offender managers. I am not clear why reorganisation is regarded as so important that it must be done quickly by June this year. The regional managers will be in place within the next year, but it has only been three years since the probation service was last reorganised and some of that reorganisation has hardly had time to settle in. That is causing concern to many people who work in the probation service.

There was not any serious consultation with stakeholders prior to the publication of the Government's plans. Patrick Carter did not appear to carry out any consultations with stakeholders or trade unions. I was told in a written answer that he was conducting an independent review, so he was not expected necessarily to consult, and that the Government's response to "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" would seek views from stakeholders on a number of issues. However, the paper was published on 6 January and the closing date for responses was 3 March, although the Cabinet Office guidelines recommend a standard 12-week period for consultation with key stakeholders. There seems to be a rush to get things through.

It would have been better if there had been consultation before, rather than after, announcements were made. That leaves us with a lot of uncertainty about how the new organisation will work, and I hope that the Minister will deal with that. We are told that one of the key aspects is that the reorganisation is about ensuring that individual offenders are managed right through the system. I cannot see how 10 regional managers will be able to deal with all the individuals concerned. I am unclear about what will happen on the ground. What will be the relationship between people in the Prison Service and people in the probation service? Where will decisions be made about what happens to an individual offender?

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I apologise for the fact that I shall not be able to stay for the whole debate. Does the hon. Gentleman agree with representatives of the Prison Officers Association in my constituency that the consultation did not make it clear whether those who work in prisons will have the same training under the new system as they have under the existing system? If that training cannot be delivered, security in prisons cannot be delivered.

Mr. Gerrard: There is a serious issue about training. I attended a meeting yesterday evening that Martin Narey addressed. The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), who is on the Opposition Front Bench, and the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) were also at that meeting. Training was mentioned. There is not enough training in general for prison officers; there is a nine-week training period for prison officers. The training period for probation officers is much longer. I hope that that will be addressed. If we expect prison officers to be much more involved in rehabilitation, dealing with reoffending, education provision, drug testing schemes and so forth, there is a case for there to be much more training, regardless of what is happening with the restructuring of the organisation.

There is a lack of clarity about what the plans will mean for staff in other respects. There are issues to do with governance, employment status, collective bargaining and the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. A part of the proposals involves what is now called contestability. That is a new word that I had not come across before I studied these proposals; some of my hon. Friends might have something to say about what it means. That has serious implications for the employment status of current staff. Naturally, there are concerns about that in prisons—there are suggestions that groups of prisons will be put out to tender—and in other parts of the service.

I was struck by a comment by the Probation Boards Association about the impact on staff. It commented as an employers' organisation on the industrial relations issues that it would need to deal with, particularly during the transition period. It said:

"An agitated workforce, already threatening industrial action over workloads is in danger of becoming demoralised by the proposals to disband its service and jettison its name. Of equal concern is the likely loss of senior managers who, seeing no future in the new structure, may look for alternative employment at a time when they are most needed to deliver the changes."

Clearly, employers in the probation service believe that, if staff in the service do not receive the reassurance that they need, there may be serious consequences over the next year, before we reach the point at which the new structure should start to operate.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is introducing and laying out his case extremely well. Does he agree that one point made to us by representatives of prison officers is that pay is on average 24 to 32 per cent. lower for those employed in the private sector than for those employed in the Prison Service, and that pensions are between 10 and 13 per cent. more valuable in the public sector than in the private sector? There is real concern among prison officers and their families about the implications of what may be happening with so-called contestability and about the lack of consultation.

Mr. Gerrard: That is absolutely right. When considering pay levels in the different sectors, people will naturally be concerned about what may happen to them if the prison in which they work becomes part of a group of prisons that ends up in the private sector. I understand clearly the rationale for involvement of the not-for-profit sector when we are dealing with community-based sentences, but I am far less convinced by the case for putting large sections of the service out to tender. I remember being involved in such arguments in this place 10 or 12 years ago, when the then Government embarked on the privatisation of prisons.

Another issue on which we need to be clear is the need to create a level playing field, so that public sector bidders are not disadvantaged. The Probation Boards Association stated:

"The government will need to create a level playing for voluntary and not-for-profit organisations to . . . enable them to participate."

The association also made a rather technical point when it said that "the current Home Office re-charge system for probation property would seriously disadvantage an 'in-house' bid in probation areas with low commercial property costs."

Those issues must be addressed, so that a level playing field is created.

Another point, which is not part of NOMS in a sense but is critical to its success, is what happens on sentencing. Martin Narey, as head of the service, will be an observer on the Sentencing Guidelines Council, which I think has had its first meeting in the past two or three weeks. However, he will not be a member of the council. If the council does not work and does not lead to changes in sentencing, we will face serious problems in the new structure—indeed, in any structure.

Perhaps the Minister will comment on what messages will be sent about sentencing, because that is the key to bringing prison numbers down. In particular, people should not be in prison doing short sentences that could be dealt with as community-based sentences. One message that came out in the meeting that some of us attended yesterday evening concerned the futility of many short sentences, because people going into prison for a short sentence do not get into drug treatment programmes, education programmes and so on. They end up doing very little while they are in prison. That message needs to be got across, particularly in magistrates courts, where there has been an enormous increase in the use of custodial sentences over the past few years.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I declare an interest as a member of the Magistrates Association. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Minister and his colleagues should consider carefully custodial sentences for offences such as shoplifting? The number of people in prison now compared with 10 years ago, when I was last sitting actively, has increased by a factor of 10. That is astonishing. Surely something needs to be done.

Mr. Gerrard: My hon. Friend is right. If I remember correctly, about 1,400 people are in prison for shoplifting, whereas a few years ago there were 100 and something; the numbers have increased by a factor of 10. That is not the only kind of offence that is relevant. Many people are in prison because of unpaid fines and motoring offences. We accept that there are some very serious motoring offences that should lead to a prison sentence, but whether everyone who is in prison for such offences should be there is another matter.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): The best kind of contestability may be to ask magistrates and judges whether they have seen any studies on whether the person they are considering sending to jail would be better disposed of in the community. The one thing that I suspect we all favour—it is one of the purposes for which NOMS was created—is seamless care and control of the person who has been convicted. We all have examples in which someone has come out of prison and the probation service has not managed to look after them. That is as big a concern as having people in prison who should not be there in the first place.

Mr. Gerrard: That is absolutely right. We also need to get the message across that community-based sentences are not necessarily soft touches. I am not sure whether that needs to be communicated to magistrates, but it certainly should be got across to the public. There is an image that, if people are given a community sentence, they are being let off, whereas such sentences can—and should in many cases—be fairly demanding to do.

I know that many hon. Members want to speak, so I will make my final points. With regard to parliamentary scrutiny of the process, it does not appear at all certain that legislation will be involved unless the role of probation boards changes substantially. Another area of uncertainty concerns what will happen to probation boards, which are currently the employers and managers of staff. There are some issues for us about how Parliament will examine the profound changes that are taking place in the rapid reorganisation. The lack of clarity about the detail is causing concern among a number of hon. Members. We do not want to repeat the mistakes that were made in other reorganisations.

As I said at the beginning of my contribution, we all want to see cuts in the number of people in prison and success in preventing people from reoffending. We want to be certain that the new structures being put in place will do that. We do not want to end up with confusion about responsibility, and over-centralisation of services such as the probation service that have been developing well at local level. I hope that the Minister will reassure us on those issues.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is advisable to remind hon. Members that, in these 90-minute Adjournment debates, it is customary to commence the first of the three winding-up speeches 30 minutes before conclusion. Five hon. Members have indicated to the Chair that they want to contribute to the debate, and another two have added themselves to the quest to catch my eye. That makes seven, and we have 41 minutes left. That means that, if I am to squeeze everyone in before 10.30, hon. Members will have to be very careful about the time that they take in making their contributions, and about allowing or responding to interventions. I ask all hon. Members to bear that carefully in mind.

While I am making announcements, I should say that I would be remiss in carrying out my duties if I did not remind the Chamber that, when any of the four senior Chairmen of the Chairmen's Panel occupies this seat, they are to be addressed as Mr. Deputy Speaker. That was the decision of Mr. Speaker.

9.50 am

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I speak as a great supporter of the probation service, who has 30 years' experience in the criminal law—not as an offender, I might add. The probation service and its independence should not be interfered with, because if it ain't broke, why fix it?

In these days of the big conversation, I cannot understand why there has been so little consultation on such a fundamentally important change. As was mentioned by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), whom I congratulate on securing the debate, the changes appear to breach the Government's own commitment on consultation in the Cabinet code on written consultation.

As the hon. Gentleman said, there does not appear to be a mechanism for any real parliamentary scrutiny of these wide-ranging changes. The National Association of Probation Officers has been told that legislation will not be required unless the role of probation boards, which manage staff locally, alters substantially.

The changes are profound, and the role of probation boards will be altered. I understand that the new service will have the power to affect the professional livelihoods of all staff currently employed in both services. That is a fundamental question, worthy of full parliamentary consideration.

The other question that I have to ask is whether the open market is appropriate for administering punishment and justice. There is a long list of unanswered questions about the detail of NOMS, including whether the national probation directorate will continue to function and what role, if any, local probation areas will have. Of course, such detail is vital and should have been consulted on properly.

NAPO considers it totally unacceptable that there should be no information about what the new structures will mean for the employment status of staff: in other words, terms, conditions, collective bargaining, trade union rights and the implications of TUPE. Many believe that the reasoning behind NOMS is flawed. A key purpose, apparently, is to reduce the projected prison population for 2009 from 93,000 to 80,000. It is difficult to see how the new structures will do that.

I fully endorse what the hon. Gentleman said about non-custodial sentences being useful. Indeed, in many cases, they lead to less recidivism. They are not a soft option, but a labour-intensive option, which is, I suspect, why magistrates tend to send people to prison rather than impose further burdens on the probation service, which, as we all know, is overburdened as it is.

We are looking at a very difficult position. NOMS is to increase co-operation between prison and probation staff—nothing wrong with that. However, that might be better achieved by other means: for example, by an increase in targeted resources, sentence planning in and out of prison and an increase in support.

Many believe that the reorganisation is an effort to cut costs. It is obvious to all who know anything about criminal justice that the prison and probation services need more resources on the front line. The probation service is in financial crisis, with probation areas facing a compulsory 2 per cent. underspend for this financial year and a further real-terms standstill budget next year. Therefore, it is of great concern that those two under-resourced services should be asked to improve performance and to implement a further layer of bureaucracy without there being a commitment to additional funding.

As has been mentioned, the last restructuring was in April 2001. Many people do not think that the changes have had time to bed down properly. The first half of "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" praises the work of both prison and probation services. Would it not be better to build on that expertise and encourage closer working relationships without including further layers of bureaucracy, which always drain resources from the front line? The progress made does not logically point to a need for the wholesale reorganisation of both services.

In "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives", there is a list of achievements. Considerable achievements have been made; it would be wrong to deny that. There has been an increase in literacy programmes for offenders, greater enforcement of community orders, a reduction in the number of escapes from prison, the launch of the custody to work initiative, the effective roll-out of drug treatment and testing orders, effective assessment of need and of risk to the public, and the establishment of multi-agency public protection arrangements, to name but a few achievements.

"Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" does not refer to the fact that the probation service was substantially reorganised in April 2001, under the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000. The number of services was reduced from 54 to 42, and a national service and directorate were created. Many of the new combined services, particularly the service in London, have not yet bedded down. As a consequence, the changes are yet to come through properly. The national probation directorate increased its number of employees from about 90 in 2001 to 460 in November 2003. In the same period, however, there was no commensurate increase in the number of field staff.

When the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service came into being, many of us warned that its introduction was rushed and not thought out properly. We have seen the result: it has been an absolute disaster. Much as I respect those who work in the field, they cannot be asked to do a 48-hour job in 24 hours. Many commentators assumed that the growth at the centre was a precursor to an increase in capacity in the field.

The conclusion that one draws is that there has been a failure adequately to resource prison and probation services. Both services are ill equipped to deal with yet another reorganisation and further layers of bureaucracy. The projected national offender management service could be an organisational disaster, compared to which the problems faced by the Criminal Records Bureau will pale into insignificance.

9.57 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): I am grateful for the conveniently labelled plan before me, so that I know in what terms I should talk.

I want to concentrate on the speedy way in which the change has been brought in. It has been produced out of the blue and imposed without consultation. There has been far too much of that in Government policy in recent times. One of the Prime Minister's policy advisers gets a bright idea on, say, foundation hospitals or top-up fees and suddenly it becomes Government policy. We workers and peasants in the party—looking around, it seems it is the old lags in this case, and some young lags, too—are asked to vote it through without being convinced of it. That seems to be happening again in this case.

The Leader of the House has promised that we will not do that kind of thing any more, and has said that the Government will consult thoroughly before new policy initiatives are announced. However, here we have another policy initiative, again coming from the No. 10 policy unit and the Government's all-purpose privatiser, Mr. Carter. It was rushed through—the Government's response was announced on the same day that the report was published.

Looking at the document, I can see that there is no necessary link between the stated aim, which is to reduce the increase in the prison population, and the merger, at national and regional levels—and eventually totally—of the two services. Prison numbers, as hon. Members have said, are a response to the panic climate of the "bang 'em up" culture, produced largely by the clamour of the Daily Mail, but responded to by Ministers and Departments. That culture says that the only way to deal with the increase in crime is to send more people to prison. We face a very retributionist mood. If that is the real cause of the increase in the prison population, I cannot see that the merger of the services will have any bearing on it. The hon. Member—I forget which constituency he represents now.

Peter Bottomley: Worthing, West.

Mr. Mitchell: I thank the hon. Gentleman. He said that we need a seamless service. However, carving out chunks of the service by privatisation will not produce that seamlessness. It will produce a fragmented service in which it is difficult, if not impossible, to follow things through. Therefore, merging the services will not produce anything that will reduce prison numbers, or achieve better treatment for prisoners. This is a question of more resources and more staff, particularly in the hard-pressed probation service, which is under considerable strain, as I can testify from representations that have come to me locally. It has just had a reorganisation, which has not quite settled down yet and has disturbed the service. It has been given tight financial targets and it is under-staffed and under-resourced. The answer to the problem is better staffing and better resources.

Mrs. Helen Clark (Peterborough) (Lab): Would my hon. Friend suggest that Home Office policy is being dictated not by the needs of the nation but by the demands of certain national newspapers? That applies to the asylum issue as well.

Mr. Mitchell: That is exactly right. It is a panic situation, to which the Home Office feels it necessary to respond. The national press, particularly the Daily Mail—this also goes for The Sun and other Murdoch papers—experiences a hackneyed fear of crime. That produces a retributionist sentencing culture on the part of magistrates who are panicked into it. The way to deal with the matter is to staff the services better and to fight against that culture, rather than submitting to it by introducing this kind of proposal, which works against staffing improvement. It seems that there is a hidden agenda to cut costs and that is why there is talk of privatising chunks of the service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) made a point about contestability. I remember it in New Zealand in the 1980s under a Labour Government there. It is a contest that the public sector always loses, because its costs are inevitably higher. It is maintaining the system and along come people—the Minister has gone to America to try to interest prison providers there—who offer a much more glamorous and exciting prospect. They are often given contracts on preferential terms, or they have been in the Prison Service, and in the glamour stakes they win. Therefore, it is not real contestability—it is a contest that is loaded against the public sector.

My basic point is that this is a question of money and resources and not one of this type of reorganisation, where so many questions have gone unanswered. I have a long list of questions, which I would like to put to my hon. Friend the Minister, but time is pressing. We do not know how many additional staff will be needed or what the role of the offender manager will be at area level. We do not know about the relationship between the local areas. A business case has not been presented to us. We do not know how the continuity of offender supervision will be maintained in the interim period. All those questions have been unanswered.

However, I cannot see any answer to the central question. The one principle of bad government is that, when things go wrong, order a reorganisation. Things are going wrong in terms of prison numbers and a reorganisation has been ordered. Perhaps the Minister can convince me with his charm and his honeyed words that this restructuring, merging of the services and opening to privatisation of chunks of the service will tackle the fundamental problem of reducing prison numbers. I do not know, but I always hope, in tense excitement, that I can be convinced.

10.5 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I will be brief. We have had compulsory competitive tendering, market testing, the public-private finance initiative, public-private partnerships, better value and now we have contestability. In reality, all paths lead to privatisation, so we may as well call it that. It is straightforward privatisation.

The origins of NOMS go back to November 2002, when the then Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Benn), announced a review of the correction services. Seminars were held in central London to discuss the wider functioning of the two services. As has been exemplified before, in February 2003, suddenly and without any consultation, the policy and the review were taken over by No. 10. Without any consultation with stakeholders, Patrick Carter was appointed to head the review. It became apparent what the review process was about: the answer to the problems of the probation service and the Prison Service was not increased investment but privatisation.

It is extremely worrying that the concept will not be the subject of legislation. We will never have the opportunity on the Floor of the House to debate any measure to implement the supposed reforms. Therefore, there will be no detailed parliamentary scrutiny. The probation service works increasingly closely with the police service and the Prison Service on public protection issues, and the House should, through the legislative process, not in Adjournment debates, properly discuss whether the market is the appropriate vehicle for delivering these services.

The Government envisage that the state of contestability should be achieved by 2009. Under that arrangement, national offender managers, supported by 10 regional offender managers, will purchase prison places and community supervision from a range of public, private and voluntary providers. I reiterate that our concern is not necessarily with the voluntary providers. We understand the role that they can play, but we are worried that a market is being introduced, and it is difficult to envisage how it will work. Many tasks undertaken by the services are already multi-agency—for example, public protection panels—and could not be the subject of tendering in competition, as we have seen elsewhere.

The 101 hostels in England and Wales provide 2,500 residential places, primarily for ex-prisoners. More than 40 per cent. of the hostel places are taken up by sex offenders and others known to local multi-agency protection panels. If public confidence is to be maintained in the service, it is essential that the public sector, in conjunction with the police, monitors those ex-prisoners to minimise the risk to the public.

Let us look at the prison experience. The main sector from which non-public organisations could recruit would be the probation service, which is already under-staffed and under-resourced. The unions feel that one consequence would be that wages would be depressed and service quality would suffer. The trade unions' experience of the market and of the public finance initiative in the justice system in the past decade differs starkly from what the Home Office has told us on successive occasions.

For example, prison officer pay is on average 24.6 to 32.4 per cent. lower in the private sector than in the Prison Service. Pensions are between 10.5 and 13.5 per cent. more valuable than pensions available to those employed by the private sector. The Prison Service offers between 5 and 28 per cent. more leave than the private sector and limited competition from the few firms bidding means that in many instances there has been only one bidder for the tender.

David Taylor: Will my hon. Friend comment on the recent merger between Group 4 and Securicor and the ability of the much vaunted market to respond in such circumstances?

John McDonnell: What is happening throughout the process is that cartels, or monopolies, are being formed, which reinforce their ability to drive down wages and suppress conditions. There is a general lack of transparency. Information is withheld, in particular from trade unions, on the ground that it is commercially confidential. Many of the questions tabled by MPs have been unable to elicit the information required to make a proper judgment of the process of privatisation at a prison or elsewhere. Consultations with the unions on the planning and procurement processes have been negligible.

Judging from recent experience, private sector involvement in the probation service has been pretty disastrous. In 2002, the national probation directorate privatised hostel facilities, including cooks, cleaners and maintenance staff. The contract was awarded to Morrison's and costs subsequently rose by 62 per cent. In 2003, the NPD decided to privatise the management and maintenance of probation premises. The increase in costs in that case was less—35 per cent.—but still outrageous.

The situation is becoming a comedy of errors, almost merging into a combination of "Fawlty Towers" and "Porridge". Staff in probation hostels have reported a catalogue of problems bordering on the farcical. I will not detail the numerous examples with which we have been supplied but there have been several complaints about standards of hygiene in kitchens and environmental health officers have been called in. People have asked how many private contractors it takes to change a light bulb in a hostel—usually only one, but it will take about four days with consultation. One hostel in Sheffield has had no regular cleaners for 12 weeks. A London hostel needed its boiler switching on and Morrison's sent a carpenter from Portsmouth. Costs build up through the inefficiencies and incompetence of the private sector.

Is it still the case, as we believed in opposition, that profits should not be made from incarcerating people, or is that now the Government's policy? It is difficult to see how the market will improve offender supervision and how it will not have the same results as we have seen in prisons of demoralising staff and driving down conditions of employment and wages. There is a real fear that the purpose of centralisation and of the review is to act as a forerunner to the wholesale privatisation of the service. That would lead to fragmentation of the service, erosion of local accountability and the failure of quality standards.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are 18 minutes remaining and four hon. Members seeking to contribute. Please bear in mind the remarks that I have made.

10.12 am

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall certainly bear in mind what you said and I shall not re-cover old ground.

I have been greatly influenced by my discussions with two probation officers in Gloucestershire, initially Gill Mackenzie, who went on to national prominence, and more recently John Carter. The fact that we do not know with who or what Mr. Carter will be replaced concerns me. I am meeting a representative of NAPO on Friday—I know that she will read the debate and will no doubt express her concerns to me.

I want to talk about something that has not yet been mentioned but is important, which is how the probation service interfaces with employment, housing and health authorities. I shall deal with the last of those three first. The Government are, according to their rhetoric, decentralising the health service, and I support that. There is an important element of discourse with the different health authorities, particularly primary care trusts, to try to get them to spend more money on caring for offenders, many of whom will have a drug problem.

However, while we appear to be decentralising the health service, we are nationalising the probation service and dividing it between a potentially more unaccountable set of bodies. I do not understand that logic. It would make sense to bed down some of the other changes, such as those to criminal justice boards, in which probation should play an important part. Unless I have understood incorrectly, those boards are based along county lines. I asked a parliamentary question to elicit who would sit on my local board, and they were all worthy people from Gloucestershire, including the chief police officer and people from the county council. I do not understand why we are taking what appears to be a contradictory approach, and that might matter for the other side of probation—community service. With the best will in the world, no national body will be able to find employment that people who are serving their sentences in the community need to have found for them.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will assuage some of my fears. From all the evidence, including that from my friends in the probation service, I know that this is a period of uncertainty that comes on the back of another reorganisation, which has yet to bed down. I hope that the Minister will consider how we assess whether this reorganisation is the appropriate way forward. If we are to have a genuine national probation service, I want assurances that that will not be pushed into the market, or removed from local accountability.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I am pleased to speak in today's debate because I am a past member of the South Glamorgan probation committee, which preceded the present board; I was a local authority representative on that committee. As my background is as a social worker, I have worked closely with probation officers in south Wales and discussed this issue with them. I can confirm that there is anxiety and concern about the proposals.

I, too, am concerned about a change so soon after the previous change in 2001. In my area of Cardiff, three probation services came together in 2001—mid, south and west Glamorgan—to become the south Wales probation service, coterminous with the police and court boundaries. We supported those changes. However, this new change, along with the change in chief officer, has caused a great deal of uncertainty and worry. It is far too soon to launch another change so swiftly after other big changes. I will be interested to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister about the future role of probation boards. I hope that he will respond to that uncertainty.

I regret the probation service becoming even more of a correctional service than a social work service. That is a move in the wrong direction, and we cannot over-emphasise the good that can be done with the traditional method of advising, assisting and befriending. The document entitled "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" states:

> "Believing that offenders in the community will reduce their re-offending through occasional interviews with probation officers is also naive."

That belittles what probation officers have managed to do with offenders over the years. They have been a great success, because they have been people whom the offender can turn to and trust.

The points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) pertain especially to Wales, because the probation service will be moved away from all the agencies with which it should work closely, such as local government, social services, housing departments and drug and alcohol services. With the existence of the National Assembly for Wales, another dimension causes difficulties. The probation service needs to be fully involved in the crime and disorder partnerships and the community first partnerships set up by the Assembly. It is difficult to get probation involved at the moment; certainly, prison is not involved at all. Things will become even more difficult when the service becomes national. When problems arise, it is important that young people in particular are seen as a part of the local community and that solutions are found in the community.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud said, we are moving away from the Government's commitment to localism towards a more national structure. That is going in the opposite direction of the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service, which is being devolved to Wales. Can the Minister say whether Wales will be classed as one of the 10 regions? Will there be an all-Wales manager? I draw his attention to the response of the Probation Boards Association, which asked:

"In a regionalised structure would the NOMS function in Wales become the responsibility of the Welsh Assembly?"

I should be grateful if the Minister commented on the role of the Welsh Assembly, which is not being taken into account in these proposals. It is so important that probation services operate at a local level, for reasons of employment and links with the voluntary sector. If contestability happens in Wales, not many people will put their names forward because we do not have much of a private sector, although we have a voluntary sector. The proposals are not at all suitable for the climate in Wales.

The other issue to take into account is the Welsh language. It is already difficult to deliver a service in Welsh. How will the devolved service and the competition for jobs deal with that sensitively? I should be grateful if the Minister addressed those points in his response.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Nine minutes and counting.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) on securing this debate. I echo his opening comments on the improvements to the Prison Service under this Government, as well as many of his other comments. I should also make it clear that I see some benefits of joining up the prison and probation services. We need a clearer pathway from prison through rehabilitation to resettlement for prisoners to become law-abiding citizens again, and it is possible that the proposal to create NOMS will achieve that.

I represent three prisons, all on Portland, which has a residential population of about 12,000 voters, and a prison population of 1,500. Some 300 people are employed in those prisons. One of them, the young offenders institution, had a £3 million custody to work programme funded by the Government, which shows that reoffending can be reduced if accommodation and employment can be found for young offenders on release, so that they have a pathway to a decent and secure future outside. As for the problem of overcrowding, there are young offenders in that prison from as far away as Newcastle.

The notion that officers working in those prisons can develop relationships with local authorities all over the country is very difficult. That reflects the importance of developing a regional approach, so that there is a limit to the number of agencies with which prisons have to liaise in order to secure that pathway.

I obviously welcome the aim of reducing the prison population that is implicit in the proposals, but I must reflect the concerns put to me by the chair of the Dorset branch of NAPO, Avril Harris. The Minister must answer the main questions that have arisen from this debate. A number of good questions about contestability were articulated, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell). If there is going to be a transfer to the private sector, we must secure the pay and conditions of all those officers working in the service on Portland. If their pay and conditions are cut to the extent that has been described in this debate, that will have a noticeable impact on the economy of the island. There are exceptionally valid questions about contestability. Why the hurry, and why the need for another reorganisation after 2001?

There is also the question of probation service funding. There is a potential vulnerability in merging the two services, especially if the Government were elected on the basis of "Prison works", rather than "Probation works". When I have had conversations about crime and antisocial behaviour in my constituency, my constituents tell me that they want to see tough community sentences, but they do not see necessarily that the answer is prison, which too often becomes a university of crime.

Problems have been created by the national probation directorate's £20 million overspend, which has been devolved to local probation services. In Dorset, it meant cuts in funding of 2 per cent. this year and 8 per cent. next year, and the 14 current job vacancies will become 14 job cuts. That is a serious diminution in the service.

I have taken note of your comments, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I shall conclude. I am not instinctively against the proposals, but in the absence in particular of proper consultation, they raise too many questions at best and considerable opposition at worst. To echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), it is time that this Government learned not to impose new ideas or to bounce us into agreeing to new policies without proper consultation. They would have a much easier time if they relaxed, took their time and ensured that we all understood what they were doing before we had to agree to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are five minutes remaining for the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Clark).

10.25 am

Mrs. Helen Clark (Peterborough) (Lab): I shall shed half my speech and be as prompt as I can.

I do not believe that the case has been made for a further reorganisation of prisons and probation, primarily because of the recent changes to the service and the achievements that the Government acknowledge have been made since 1997. Those developments should be monitored, evaluated and built on rather than made the subject of further disruptive change—that that is my view about many other strands of current Government policy, particularly in the field of home affairs.

The substantial reorganisation of probation service structures implemented in April 2001 should have been monitored and independently evaluated prior to the introduction of yet further structural changes. If we had had such sensible and careful evaluation, we might have concluded that the creation of the national offender management service was not needed.

It is vital that the probation service is close to the community that it serves. I welcomed the 2001 reorganisation, which established coterminous boundaries for police, local authorities and the Crown Prosecution Service. That process is continuing, as the reorganised court structure will also be coterminous by spring 2005. Many hon. Members have praised probation, and it plays a key role in representing the local community, particular ethnic minority groups such as those in my constituency.

The Prime Minister talked about centralisation in his The Guardian lecture. He said:

"When central government becomes too big it sucks up resources that should be at the front line. It runs the risk that ministers and officials try to intervene even when there is little value they can add. We must create a centre that is streamlined and focused, developing strategic frameworks, for example the thinking the Home Office is doing on how different kinds of criminality—organised crime, repeat offending, anti-social behaviour—require different organisation and policy responses. A centre that acts as a resource for best practice, that sets and monitors minimum standards, that intervenes in the front line rarely but in the case of failure doing so swiftly and effectively."

I agree with that. I am not an advocate of change for the sake of change. We need to build on the foundations that we have to create public confidence in such essential services and home affairs policy in general.

10.28 am

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) on securing an important debate.

The Minister may leave this debate thinking that there is a measure of disquiet on the Government Benches about his proposals and that he needs to provide some reassurance. I share some of the concerns expressed. The key question on the issue of the service being correctional, or one that provides social assistance to offenders, is whether it protects the public and reduces reoffending. That is the test that needs to be applied to the reorganisation.

Any sensible person would argue that there is a case for better integration of the Prison Service and probation service. Inherent in some of the Government's other policies such as custody plus, which we have welcomed, is the aim of ensuring a seamless transition between different elements of sentencing policy. I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Walthamstow that there have been some improvements in the management of offenders in the present Prison Service and probation service. I sometimes think that those improvements are slightly over-advertised and that there is an awful lot to do in terms of prison education, dealing with health—particularly mental health problems—and women in prison. Those are still real issues. Nevertheless, there have been improvements.

The major problem faced by the Prison Service is that we send too many people to prison and we have not got the accommodation to meet their needs. That problem will not go away as a result of a structural reorganisation of this kind. More consideration must be given to better fine management as an alternative and the use of the Sentencing Guidelines Council (Supplementary Provisions) Order 2004 to provide public confidence in the alternatives to prison and ways of sentencing offenders. That leads, incidentally, to much higher visibility for non-custodial sentences, so people feel that something is happening in their community to those who have offended against it.

I have the highest regard for the probation service, which comes from way back in the days when I was working with it as leader of a county council. The service is facing huge problems, as the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) said. The problems of financing the probation service are becoming an almost unbearable burden on its effective operation. I have heard nothing from the Minister or his colleagues that suggests that that funding crisis is being addressed. We have a structural change, but the immediate problem of not being able to provide a sufficient number of officers in the probation service to do the job that we want them to do is not being dealt with. That has knock-on effects for the police, the court system and, of course, most immediately for offenders and their families.

The financial crisis in the probation service is made worse by an absurd system of target management, whereby fines are imposed on probation services for not meeting the targets that the Government have set. I understand—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—that 37 of the 42 probation services have been fined a total of £4.3 million in the past year for failing to meet their targets. There is a correlation between a target-based approach and a failure of the service.

The reorganisation is yet another aspect of the restless change that is endemic in the Home Office. There is an almost permanent state of revolution in the area of home affairs, which, uniquely, is rallying to the standards raised by the leader writers of the Daily Mail. That is not an attractive aspect of the Government's programme. Hon. Members have already drawn attention to that. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) mentioned the analogy with CAFCASS and the fact that it was a mess because the Government did not take the time to get the measures right in the first instance, but rushed through a reform and repented at leisure. That must not happen again.

On looking at the parliamentary answers to questions asked about the national offender management service, I find all too often that the Minister says that it is too early to say what the answer is to a particular question. We must start getting those answers, and we need them quickly if the speed of change envisaged by the Government is to continue.

There is so much uncertainty occasioned by that vagueness on the final outcome that inevitably it causes concern among practitioners in the service, who simply want to be able to do their job more effectively. It is not an easy change. As I said when it was first announced, we are melding two organisations with a different ethos and different ways of doing things. If anyone imagines that the transition will be effortless, they are wrong. Much careful thought needs to be applied to the process, and I have no confidence that that has yet been done. One of the greatest worries for all of us is that, in implementing the proposals, we will lose some of the essential elements of inter-agency working, which is so valuable in that area of work.

We know of the concerns that have been expressed by probation officers and prison officers. Some of those concerns have been have been raised in the debate by other hon. Members, so I shall not repeat them. Probation officers and prison officers look at the process, which has been rather grandly labelled "metamorphosis"—with a fine disregard for both Kafka and Ovid in its implications—and know that it follows on from a process that was, equally absurdly, labelled "a new choreography". They wonder at what point the new choreography becomes the metamorphosis, and how those processes overlap. They consider their terms and conditions, which are perfectly proper considerations for those working in the service, and wonder where the process is going. They also examine the new concept of contestability—I wonder how many more euphemisms Governments, whether it be this Government or the previous right-wing Government, will find for this essential process of privatisation. I think that it was the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) who read out a list of terms that have been applied to what is essentially the same process. We now have a new term, contestability, and we must see how it works. There are benefits in the process for some aspects of the Prison Service—I will not take a rigid ideological view—but I wonder how it will be applied in any valuable way to the work of probation officers.

I seek an explanation from the Minister on the regional dimension. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) tabled a written question about whether the national offender management service would work closely on a regional level with the complementary services, including the police. The Minister's reply was that the supervision of offenders

"is best managed at regional level where effective links can be forged and joint strategies developed with complementary services including police, health, education and employment."—[Official Report, 9 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 1269W.]

Have I missed something there? We do not have regional police forces. Police forces are based on police authority areas, which are coterminous with the present probation boards. We do not have regional education services; we have local education authorities. Health is no longer organised on a regional basis; the trusts, which are not regional bodies, are now the prime operatives for health. What is the regional co-ordination that the Minister says will be improved by the new structure operating on a regional basis?

I am concerned that we will lose innovation at local level through seeking consistency, which may be of value in some cases, but too often will be a dumbing-down of the process. I am also concerned that there is insufficient parliamentary scrutiny of the process. I return to my initial point. The test is whether the proposal will reduce reoffending and protect the public. The Minister must persuade his hon. Friends and the country at large that the changes will achieve that. Assertion will not do it. There must be a fully rounded strategy that demonstrates where the added value in the process lies.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) on securing the debate. Many of us, having heard some of the comments about the NOMS proposals, decided to apply for such a debate, and I was glad that he led the charge on this occasion. Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship. If there were contestability for the role of the speaking clock, I know whom I would back.

Rarely have I heard so much disquiet expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber about a Government proposal. I am sad to hear the concern expressed by all hon. Members this morning, not least because, in the short time that I have been speaking on prison matters for my party, I have seen some of the excellent work that is being carried out in our prisons and some first-class work that is being carried out by not-for-profit agencies. Many individuals in the probation service, the Prison Service and the voluntary sector do sterling work in this difficult and sensitive area. We should set our debate today against the background of that excellent work and the current chronic overcrowding in our prisons.

I appreciate that the Minister will have only 10 minutes in which to wind up and that he has another debate on prisoners this afternoon, but today's debate cannot pass without taking into account the fact that more than 75,000 prisoners are now in custody and there are fewer than 200 places available before we have meltdown in the service. I hope that the Minister will be able to comment on that. Can he confirm that women prisoners are being moved out of Winchester and Edmunds Hill to other accommodation? How many of our police forces are on standby for Operation Safeguard? We have a Prison Service that is in crisis as we debate this matter.

I want to congratulate the Government because I have rarely seen such speed. Patrick Carter presented his report to the Prime Minister on 11 December 2003. In the intervening period, we had Christmas but on 6 January the Government were able to produce "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives", their response to the Carter report. That breaks all records for a Government response. It is a miracle what can be achieved over the Christmas period when one sets one's mind to it.

When we see how rapidly the Government responded, all the alarm bells start ringing. We heard them today. The Home Secretary proudly declared that this was the next phase of the Government's strategy to improve the criminal justice system, a system that he acknowledged needed attention when he spoke of the deep disquiet about it. We never expected him to have a ready-made response on the drawing board before the Carter report was presented, so that it could be whipped out at the beginning of the year.

[Mrs. Cheryl Gillan]

The debate has highlighted the concerns of the probation service, the Prison Service, the unions and politicians on both sides of the House. The Minister will have a difficult time answering the massive amount of questions that have been raised by hon. Members. I hope that he will not try to produce all the answers in his allotted 10 minutes but will write to each and every hon. Member who has participated, whether in an intervention or in a short speech. He has to start putting the flesh on the bones of these proposals and to come out with the detail.

Like many of the organisations that have been cited today, I was surprised that the proposed changes required no parliamentary scrutiny. I should be grateful if the Minister confirmed that he still does not plan to allow any parliamentary scrutiny at any stage other than through the medium of Adjournment debates or questions. Does he consider that adequate, bearing in mind that he is creating a completely new service that will take over the employment of thousands of people and responsibility for the entire downstream part of the criminal justice system? Victims of crime, offenders and people who work in the criminal justice system are concerned because, again, we appear to be seeing the creation of a centralised monolith, to say nothing of the budget that it will command. People need to see that there is parliamentary scrutiny and accountability.

The response of the probation boards to NOMS sums it up. They say that they are dismayed that the Home Office appears to have taken far-reaching decisions without public or parliamentary scrutiny. They raise further questions, reflecting the surprise that, after the major and costly reorganisation of the probation service less than three years ago, the Government now propose to dismantle the service with little or no evaluation of the effects of the original reorganisation. Can the Minister say why no business case or costings have been available on NOMS and, in particular, what the implications are for the investment that has already been made in the probation service's reorganisation? Is that an investment that the Government are now prepared to write off?

NAPO has registered fundamental concerns about the proposals. It does not hold back on the questions that it asks and the criticisms that it makes. It believes that the proposals have been hurriedly announced and that they appear to be ill thought out and lacking in detail. Following a meeting of NAPO's national executive committee on 29 January, representatives from its 37 branches unanimously passed a motion to oppose the introduction of NOMS as currently proposed. That took place some time ago, and I am sure that it has been communicated to the Minister.

I hope that the Minister will address the concerns that have been expressed and say how he will handle the obvious problem that is developing with the unions. They have concerns with the timetable, and they make the point that the Government's own code of practice requires a standard 12-week period of consultation, which does not appear to have taken place in the case of NOMS—they are disregarding the code on occasions. I want the Minister to explain why, or to announce that he will reorganise the timetable, so that we have longer to consider the implications of these changes and the way in which they can be brought about.

Many speeches have reflected the high degree of uncertainty that probation staff and NAPO members have about their future. That will have serious consequences for recruitment and affect the functioning of the probation service. There are some alarming statistics on the numbers of prison officers who have joined and left the service over the past few years. During the past three financial years, 3,647 prison officers have left the service and only 2,245 have joined. The Minister must address the uncertainty among staff. That is also reflected in the figures that show the differences between remuneration packages in the private sector and in the Prison Service.

The logic behind the Minister's creation of NOMS escapes everybody. We all appreciate that changes need to be made to the service. I have been acquainted with this area a short time, but it seems that nothing much has changed since I started visiting prisons as an articled clerk just a few years ago. There still does not appear to be a seamless service between how offenders are treated in prison and how they are reintegrated into the community when they come out. People have been trying, but there has been continual failure. Everyone would support the proposals if NOMS could create that seamless service, so that we could reduce reoffending. However, it is difficult to understand how the reorganisation, as it is currently proposed, will help to achieve those aims.

Last night, the hon. Member for Walthamstow and I listened to Martin Narey. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) will be interested to learn that Martin Narey made much of the fact that he is intending to save money over the period that he is in charge of the reorganisation and merger of these two sides of the criminal justice system. I would be interested to hear from the Minister how much money he is anticipating saving on those budgets, because the cat is out of the bag now and we need to know that.

There are 1 million questions, and I hope that the Minister is becoming familiar with them. The proposals will affect a large number of people. Many believe that they are panic proposals. That has been articulated today. There is little confidence in the process and a distinct absence of detail. We are looking to the Minister to provide us with an explanation and enlightenment on the handling, logic and uncertainty that exist around the creation of NOMS.

10.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): Ten minutes is not a long time in which to respond to all the questions that have been asked. I will do my best in the time available, but I will write to all hon. Members who have participated in today's debate to ensure that they receive a full answer.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) on securing the debate and thank him for doing so. There was an opportunity to question my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary when he made his statement to the House in January, but this morning's debate has provided an opportunity for a more thoughtful discussion, having had the chance to reflect on the document that was published at that time. This thoughtful debate is built on the tremendous amount of experience that all hon. Members who have participated in it have of the correctional services.

There are three key reasons why the proposals in "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" are so important. First, there is the day-to-day experience of the people who operate our prison and probation services. We all know, because we talk to those people, that there are still many gaps in the service—too many cracks in the system—through which offenders can fall back into crime. Although I know full well from my visits to prisons and the probation service that there is a lot of anxiety about the impact of changes on individual members of staff, there is a recognition that joining the two services together as we intend will provide a more effective service.

Secondly, Patrick Carter provided a powerful assessment in the correctional services review. Hon. Members have had the opportunity to read the document. I shall refer to a number of key points that it contained, such as the sentencing drift. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) referred to custodial sentences for shoplifting. The fact is that people are three times more likely to receive a custodial sentence in a magistrates court for that now than 10 years ago, and twice as likely in a Crown court. The prison population increased from 55,000 in 1996 to 66,000 in 2002, and is 75,000 today. That inexorable rise does not reflect an increase in criminality.

Patrick Carter identified regional disparities. For example, someone who is convicted of an assault in Lancashire has a one in 50 chance of going to prison, whereas in parts of London the chance can be as high as one in three. Patrick Carter's projections were that, if we did nothing to the correctional services, by 2009 there will be 93,000 people in our prisons and some 300,000 people on community sentences. He concluded that, even if we allowed that to happen, it would not be an effective way to reduce reoffending. Accordingly, he advocated greater use of financial penalties and called for a more effective use of community sentences, not least using electronic surveillance, which is increasingly available.

Patrick Carter called for a new role for the judiciary, particularly the Sentencing Guidelines Council—looking not just at what is an appropriate punishment but at what is effective. His conclusion was that, if we could rebalance the correctional system with more people out of short-term prison sentences and on to community sentences, and more people fined, rather than given probation, we could have a stable prison population of about 80,000 by the end of the decade. Such matters would all have to be underpinned by effective case management of individual offenders.

Thirdly, there is the Criminal Justice Act 2003, within which we are creating the new generic community sentence and, perhaps more important, new sentences of custody plus and a new arrangement whereby people on determinate sentences of more than 12 months will serve half their sentence in prison and half in the community under supervision. In other words, no longer will we have prison sentences for some and community sentences for others—we will have increasing numbers of sentences that combine the two elements. Therefore, it is essential that we bring the prison and the probation services together.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that change occurs when there is chaos and when there is crisis. That is far from the case in respect of the matter under discussion. As hon. Members from all parties have said, much has been achieved in our prison and probation services in recent years, of which we should be proud. We are now spending £3.2 billion on prisons and probation. That is an increase of £900 million in real terms. There have been 11,000 additional members of staff, and some 5,000 of them have gone to the probation service over the past six years, so I do not recognise the description of that service as being denuded of staff.

Hon. Members have paid tribute to the achievements in terms of education, detoxification and drug treatment in the Prison Service. That there have been achievements is equally true of the probation service, which has been rebuilt, having dwindled under the previous Government, when no investment was made in training, and there was very little public commitment to it. That service is now putting new sentences into place, such as the drug treatment and testing order and the intensive control and change programme. That is real innovation, and provides the effective alternative to prison that so many hon. Members have called for.

Mention has been made of the speed of implementation. The correctional services review was announced in the "Justice for All" White Paper published in July 2002, so it was not a surprise that a review was taking place. "Reducing Crime—Changing Lives" is the Government's initial response to the Carter review, and gives an indication of the direction in which we go. It will take at least five years from the implementation of the national offender management service in 1 June for the new system to be fully operational.

I want the process of moving to that service to be inclusive for the staff delivering front-line services. I offer the Chamber an assurance that that is how I intend the reform to happen. For example, I want staff representation on the board of the national offender management service, so that there is interface and dialogue between the Home Office, Ministers and senior officials in the Department and those who provide front-line services.

Mention was made of training. There will be a continued commitment to appropriate training. The training offered to a prison officer in a high-security establishment will be different from that offered to a probation officer working with drug treatment and testing orders and responsible for the supervision that they involve.

The word "contestability" was used. We are talking about contestability, not privatisation. Contestability is about getting the best value out of the investment that the taxpayer makes. We have seen from the contestability applied to the Prison Service that there is much to be gained from it, certainly in terms of an improved service and better value for money. I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby that the public sector does not always lose. Blakenhurst and Buckley Hall, two prisons that were in the private sector, are back in the public sector, providing better value than the private sector could offer. I want a contestability philosophy in correctional services that allows us to include the best of the public, private and not-for-profit or community sectors, the latter of which is so important.

On staffing issues, I understand that there will always be anxiety among members of staff when their service is to be reorganised in a way that may impact on them. I pledge, as I have done throughout, that there will be full negotiation with the relevant trade unions and staff if there are to be any changes to staff's terms and conditions.

I have been asked about parliamentary scrutiny. If there were to be a change to the employing body for probation officers and a change to the local area boards, that would be subject to legislative change, and there would be the usual parliamentary scrutiny associated with that. If the prison population is to be stable when it has increased by 5,000, and if probation officers are not just to provide intervention but to become the offender managers of the future, what with the additional capacity required to implement the Criminal Justice Act, there will be a role for every prison and probation officer in the service, and more besides. That is because we need to do more, with ever greater numbers.

My final point is that, in the end, the reorganisation is not just about rearranging the furniture; it is also about reducing reoffending. That has to be our overall objective.

Offshore Oil and Gas Industry

11 am

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): It is five months since I last secured a debate on this topic. It could be argued that not a lot has changed, so why we are having another debate? The slow pace of progress is the main problem, and what is happening in the UK oil and gas industry—or, rather, what is not happening—is now clearer. We can now see that it is even more urgent for certain things to happen if we are to maximise opportunities and not witness the premature decline of our oil and gas industry.

I note that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions will reply to this debate. I hope that she will take back today's central message to her Department and work with the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services on the issues that I raise. Those issues are important to regional economies and manufacturing in the UK—which are both in my right hon. Friend's portfolio, I believe—as well as to energy policy and Treasury revenues.

For any country, reserves of oil and gas are an extremely valuable asset. They represent a huge source of national wealth—in our case from tax revenues—and a source of employment. More than 350,000 people used to be employed in the industry, although that is sadly not so today. Oil and gas reserves also provide a secure energy supply. On any of those counts, it is vital to maximise recovery of our oil and gas, and added together, they demonstrate that it would be irresponsible not to do everything to extract all the reserves that can be economically exploited. However, that is what we risk doing at a time when we need all the energy that we can get—although we could do without last week's exaggerated scare from the BBC.

I intend to argue that, if the Government set the direction, the oil and gas industry could play a huge part in meeting our environmental policy commitments to reducing CO_2 emissions. However, I want first to speak about the Government's draft allocation plan for the emissions trading scheme. The emissions allowances for the offshore oil and gas sector must be incorrect, as they are not based on business as usual and involve reductions of 30 to 45 per cent. The natural characteristics of oil and gas reservoirs also mean that the pressure in the reservoir falls as the field matures, which results in the need for increasing amounts of power to extract hydrocarbons and deliver them to shore. There is a real problem in the draft plan that needs sorting out, and I hope that it will be.

Our oil and gas is not running out. The industry, the Government and experts such as Professor Alex Kemp of Aberdeen university agree that, as 33 billion barrels of oil equivalent have already been produced from the North sea, between 22 billion and 31 billion barrels are still left. That is enough for significant production to continue well beyond 2020—plus that which may yet be discovered. However, the activity survey published in January by the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association and the Department of Trade and Industry paints a worrying picture. We are simply not on course to recover those amounts. Only 14 billion barrels—about 50 per cent. of what is available—are even targeted, and only 70 per cent. of that will be produced by 2010 if all the planned work goes ahead.

Even more worrying is the question of whether the work will go ahead. There are low levels of new activity, even though the oil price is $33 a barrel and has been high for one of the longest sustained periods ever. If there are not higher levels of activity on the United Kingdom continental shelf in that scenario, one can only wonder what might happen if oil prices dropped back to the low $20s or below. The survey reports that forecasts for near-term oil and gas production continue to slip. It concludes:

"Urgent action by all stakeholders, including Government, is required to increase investment in marginally economic fields, maximise the recovery of reserves in producing (brown) fields and stimulate the exploration and appraisal activity that is essential for future production."

The most significant measure of activity that gives a pointer to the future is drilling, which was even lower in 2003 than the previous low levels of recent years. It was 10 per cent. down for exploration and appraisal wells in 2002, and 20 per cent. down for development wells. Historically, those are pitifully low levels. If we do not drill, we do not find, we do not produce and there is no tax revenue.

The supply chain industry is contracting; thousands of jobs have already been lost, as fabrication yards along the coast have closed or lie idle. The yard in my constituency has been virtually empty for months, although the company is actively pursuing contracts and wind turbines are being assembled there instead. Why is that happening? It is easy to call for tax breaks from the Government; fiscal incentives have a part to play, but we must consider the behaviour of oil companies.

Too often, the prevailing view is that the best that can be achieved is managed decline, but some companies want to explore, and others want to develop brownfields and in so doing invest significant proportions of their capital in new activity. New entrants that specialise in mature provinces are being attracted, and some well-established players want to do more. However, some companies appear to be harvesting—deriving huge revenues from substantial production levels from existing fields, especially at the record high oil price—yet reinvesting only a tiny proportion of those revenues in the North sea, placing most of what is available for investment in other parts of the world to gain higher returns. That may be good business for those companies, but it is not so good for UK plc, although even such minor reinvestment adds up to a substantial amount and it is a large proportion of the reduced total of investment in the North sea. However, that is not a recipe for maximising recovery, tax revenue, employment and energy for UK plc.

A great deal of work has been done in the joint industry-Government body PILOT: excellent initiatives on fallow fields, undeveloped discoveries, progressing partnerships, and supply-chain efficiency. Unfortunately, the end result is as I described: the PILOT vision of maintaining production at 3 million barrels in 2010 will not be achieved if we carry on as we are.

The success rate of exploration drilling has been higher in recent years, but much less has been carried out and, sadly, too often the UK continental shelf is seen as a difficult, time-consuming and costly place to do business. What is wrong? Time and again, oil companies that are keen to develop the field complain about access to infrastructure or high charges for use demanded by other, usually larger, companies.

There are complaints from companies that believe that they have a good prospect about access to assets and licences owned but not used by other companies. Sometimes, partnerships cannot be realigned because one company is reluctant. Such problems are not unique to the UK continental shelf, but it is unacceptable that it seems to take so long to reach agreement and negotiate the necessary deals. One executive told me recently that what takes 30 days to sort out in Canada or the Gulf of Mexico can take 30 months here.

The Government cannot let the UK's assets be wasted or not fully and efficiently exploited because of commercial interests or lack of interest. Our licensing and regulatory regime suited the earlier years of regular, substantial discoveries, but it is not so appropriate to today's circumstances. We have already had one voluntary code of practice on infrastructure access, which did not work, and another is being negotiated. Will the terms be tougher? Will they be adhered to? Will the new code be any better than its predecessor? Is it taking too long to draw up? It certainly is. New developments need to be taken forward before the existing infrastructure is decommissioned or shut down.

The point is that oil and gas is not running out, but time is. Those who do not use assets must give way to those who will use them, and the Department of Trade and Industry must use its powers to determine price disputes between companies. We must ensure that all assets are made available in one form or another to those best able and willing to invest in and make maximum use of them.

I will say something about fiscal measures; it is Budget day, after all. Last year, the Treasury undertook a major consultation on low levels of activity, involving unprecedented engagement with the industry. The problem was that it was difficult to get a unified view, except that what seemed to be on offer from the Treasury would not make a difference. Unsurprisingly, that view did not appear in the pre-Budget report.

There still does not appear to be much unity of view between companies investing a high proportion and those investing a low proportion of their returns in the North sea. However, we need a fiscal regime that encourages movement from so-called harvesting towards investment in exploration and development. Could that be done at no cost to the Treasury, and without unwanted consequences? I do not know. We have to accept that there are marginal fields that are not economic to develop under the present fiscal regime, but it is obvious that it will be difficult to persuade the Treasury to give anything away unless the industry changes the culture on non-fiscal matters that are preventing the maximisation of hydrocarbon recovery. We have only a two or three-year window to get this right; otherwise, we may enter a decline that it might not be easy to arrest.

There is another reason why we need to act quickly. Our oil and gas industries have an important role to play in wider energy policy relating to our obligation to meet targets on emissions of CO_2: carbon capture and storage, and enhanced oil recovery. The idea is to capture the CO_2 emitted from gas and coal-fired power stations fitted with special equipment, pipe it under the sea and bury it by injecting it into oil reservoirs that are nearing the end of their lives. The effect of that will be to enhance the oil and squeeze out more of it—a new chapter in maximising the recovery of valuable assets.

We know that that is technically achievable, and I am grateful to Dr. John Gibbins of Imperial College for the information that he has provided. However, the bigger prize is near-zero emissions in electricity generation. The technology would provide the legal and lower-cost storage that we need for the first few decades, and could maintain and extend the necessary infrastructure for long-term storage for hundreds of years, using aquifers deep beneath the floor of the North sea.

Why do we need that? If we consider the electricity projections to 2020, we see a substantial rise in consumption. Even if we reach the target of 20 per cent. generation from renewables—and there must be some doubt about that—given the reduction in generation from retiring nuclear power stations, the overall projection is that zero-emission generation in the UK will not increase significantly between 2010 and 2020. Therefore, there will be insufficient reduction in CO_2 to meet our stated targets, including the target of a 60 per cent. cut in carbon emissions by 2050.

Unless we go down the road of carbon capture and storage, the only answer will be to create another generation of nuclear power stations. Whatever one thinks of nuclear power, a new generation of such stations would present political problems. In any case, it would be sensible to have another option; we may need both. Carbon capture and storage is the only other option. That is why we must move forward with that and with enhanced oil recovery, as detailed in last year's energy White Paper, which recognised the strong case for both and set up a study.

I understand that the DTI is about to publish the report. I imagine that it will state that the market will not deliver carbon capture and storage and enhanced oil recovery, and that oil industry revenues will be too low and too long-term under simple market conditions to deliver them. Their delivery would therefore require some strategic priority from the Government, but so would nuclear build, and that might be even more expensive. If carbon capture and storage and enhanced oil recovery are to be an option, and because of the long lead-in times involved, we must move forward now. Even more crucially, if enhanced oil recovery is not started in the second decade of this century, oilfields will be closed and the opportunity lost for ever. Additional revenue from increased oil production will not then be available to offset carbon capture and storage electricity generation costs.

This is a great opportunity for the UK to take a global lead in these technologies, and to bring future economic success and jobs. The technology is also key to enabling developing countries to participate in CO_2 emissions reduction while still using their own resources for the economic and social development that they need and from which they will not want to turn away.

Time is of the essence. The key point that I want to make is that time is running out and that unless all stakeholders and the Government ensure that action is taken now, those great opportunities to maximise the recovery of our oil and gas reserves and to pursue new environmentally beneficial technology will be lost, and, along with them, jobs in parts of the country that really need them and much needed tax revenues and energy.

11.15 am

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) on initiating this debate, which is, as he said, a follow-up to the debate that was held last October and is part of his ongoing work to bring these issues to Parliament's attention, to put pressure—understandably—on Government, and to engage stakeholders more widely. He plays an important role in that. I hope that I can give him some encouragement not only about progress since October's debate, but about progress on initiatives that were instituted before then.

My hon. Friend is right that the energy White Paper, which was published just over a year ago, reaffirms our commitment to maintaining an active and successful oil and gas industry and to promoting the future development of the UK's oil and gas reserves. There are still huge quantities of oil and gas to be produced from under the North sea—potentially more than we have already produced. The Government are committed to working closely with industry, the oil companies and their supply chain to secure the best licensing, environmental and business frameworks to attract the investment activity that is needed to deliver that potential. We believe that, working together, we can explore and produce every economic drop of oil; but there is no room for complacency.

Through the PILOT process and the Government-industry oil and gas forum, we are making progress on providing the right incentives for continued and new investment from existing and new players. In particular, we are continuing enhancements to our licensing processes; considering ways to free up more fallow acreage; working to ensure third-party access to infrastructure on fair and reasonable terms; seeking continued improvement to commercial behaviours; pursuing further innovations; and working with industry to ensure that the UK supply chain remains competitive.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Tyneside, North) (Lab): I know that the Minister is aware of the importance of the offshore industry to employment and the manufacturing sector not only in the United Kingdom generally, but in the north-east of England specifically. We were particularly worried about the failure of AMEC to win the contract for the Buzzard development. In the light of that experience, will her Department reconsider the licensing regime to identify the ways in which it can benefit the UK offshore industry and secure British jobs in British yards?

Jacqui Smith: As I said, we constantly update the licensing regime to ensure that it encourages activity. I understand my right hon. Friend's disappointment about the case of AMEC, although the Buzzard field is directly sustaining around 1,000 jobs between Hartlepool and Scotland in companies that won contracts. I assure him that we shall continue to do what we can to support the UK energy industry supply chain companies such as AMEC to help to build up their competitiveness. That is a key role of the DTI's oil and gas industry development directorate, which works with regional partners—not least in my right hon. Friend's constituency—to ensure that we are in the best possible position to take advantage of the activity that taking place.

The licensing regime must adapt to the changing commercial environment and bring about activity as quickly as possible. That is why, in the 21st offshore licensing round last year, we offered a new form of licence to attract new entrants. The promote licence was offered at a 10th of the cost of a traditional licence, and proved very popular. The response to that round was the best for years: 89 licences were awarded, including 53 promote licences. During last year's debate, my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services mentioned the Prospect fair, which was a successful event that gave those awarded with promote licences an opportunity to inform industry and financiers of their plans for acreage and to attract investment. We are looking forward to seeing which of the promote licensees will be the first to deliver a firm drilling commitment. As regards progress since last October, earlier this month we announced the 22nd offshore licensing round, which makes available the largest number of blocks since the second round in 1965.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central) (Lab): My right hon. Friend rightly points to the positive measures that the Government are introducing to encourage activity in the North sea. My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) made a powerful speech setting out the disincentives to activity, such as the difficulty in gaining access to infrastructure and the fact that several companies are holding on to acreage. Around 80 per cent. of explorable acreage in the North sea is held by just half a dozen companies, which are investing elsewhere in the world while queues of new entrants are desperate to get access to that acreage. Are the Government addressing that problem?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend has made that case strongly before. The 22nd round adds to promote licences the new frontier licences, which allow companies to apply for relatively large amounts of acreage at reduced cost. That will allow more time for exploration and development, reflecting the additional technical challenges, especially in the Atlantic margin west of the Shetland islands. The change in the licensing regime will help to promote the introduction of new entrants and activity that my hon. Friends the Member for Waveney and for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran) have called for.

There is no doubt that we need to encourage more exploration activity. In 2003, there was a small increase in the number of exploration and appraisal wells drilled in the UK, although if one scans back over the past decade it is clear that the number is still relatively small. Nevertheless, there are some encouraging signs—for example, the recent drilling success of new entrant Oilexco on the Brenda prospect, where good quantities of oil appear to be present. That acreage was specifically identified by the DTI, and it was promoted and awarded in the 20th offshore licensing round in 2002. That is good news for the UK continental shelf. It gives us confidence that there is sufficient untapped potential to encourage experienced players from overseas and that that can be done within two years.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Will the Minister give way?

Jacqui Smith: Yes, but hon. Members must recognise that giving way limits what I can say.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister said that good things are happening, and I accept that there are encouraging signs. I agree with the hon. Member for Waveney that there is huge untapped potential and little sign of firm action to release the substantial amount of fallow acreage. What more does the Department intend to do to secure the release of that fallow acreage and to get the exploration figures to a more reasonable level?

Jacqui Smith: I was coming to that. Early indications are that more exploration and appraisal wells need to be drilled in 2004 than last year. Certain fiscal measures, especially the tax change, are designed to stimulate exploration activity in the North sea by companies without current taxable income. The exploration expenditure supplement will increase the amount of exploration and appraisal expenditure that can be carried from one accounting period to the next for a maximum of six years. It is important to set the right climate for investment, and that is what we are doing.

Several hon. Members referred to fallow blocks. We have continued to push hard in dealing with that. For example, 151 fallow blocks are identified on the DTI's oil and gas website, including 109 blocks that were added to the list this January. They must have significant activity planned within one year of being put on the website, or be relinquished. In addition, there are 83 fallow discoveries, including 17 that were added to the list in January, for which a licensee or third party has two years from publication to come forward with plans for significant activity. That drives precisely the kind of emphasis on action on fallow blocks for which hon. Members have argued. In fact, since the PILOT process began in 2002, eight exploration or appraisal wells have been drilled on those blocks. As a result, three new fields are being developed and two other wells have been announced as discoveries. Since 2002, 10 discoveries are no longer fallow because they have had new dedicated seismic, and a further eight discoveries have had appraisal drilling. Thirteen discoveries are no longer fallow because they are included in development plans approved by the DTI or are part of fields now in production.

Despite those outcomes, there is no room for complacency. We will continue to work with the industry to push for even more acreage to be made available. We have taken action to ensure that there can be no more inactivity on licences. All new standard licences issued now have a shorter overall term to ensure that new acreage that is acquired but not worked on is handed back and made available for others to exploit.

On infrastructure, the key issues relate to perceptions about access and the time that it takes for some deals to go through on the UK continental shelf. I am pleased that the industry has been fully engaged in discussions on that and has reached an agreement to take forward measures to allow the Government to intervene in cases in which commercial negotiations are stagnating. That is a response to concerns that were raised in the previous debate about the unwillingness of those suffering to come forward to complain; it establishes a process for such intervention. That consensus was reached last October, and detailed implementation of the infrastructure work group is progressing well.

In terms of commercial practices, last year the industry signed up to the master deed agreement. The commercial code of practice is also relevant. The DTI and the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association—UKOOA—are pulling in the results of a code of practice survey for 2003 and intend to report to PILOT in the coming months on trends and industry performance. Action is therefore under way on ensuring access to infrastructure. Work is also being undertaken on the great potential for additional production in our brownfields. The PILOT brownfield work group published its second brownfield benchmarking studies in 2003.

We already have good examples of the industry's commitment not to miss out. UK independents are making significant investments. Those include Paladin; Energy North Sea's recent plans for the Montrose and Arbroath fields, where substantial drilling contracts have just been awarded; and Venture's acquisition, with Dana, of the Kittiwake fields.

More generally, at this stage in the life of the UKCS, a wide spectrum of companies—existing and new players, large, medium and small—must be involved if we are fully to exploit all the opportunities. I have explained how we are making progress through the licensing process and action on access to infrastructure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney asked about CO_2 capture and storage. We are aware of the benefits that carbon capture and storage could provide in contributing to our energy White Paper target. Indeed, we recently undertook two studies of the feasibilities of those technologies and concluded that, in time, they could assist us in meeting that target, although in the longer term—beyond 2020. The first study investigated the feasibility of carbon capture and storage; the second considered the possibility of using CO_2 for enhancing the recovery of oil from our depleting oil fields as a lead-in to CO_2 storage by enabling an infrastructure to be developed. We are about to publish that second report.

Meanwhile, we are developing a carbon abatement technology programme that will provide a basis for a strategy for the use of fossil fuels for power generation. We plan to publish that strategy towards the end of the year. We also have an ongoing research programme—the sustainable hydrocarbons additional recovery programme—that is specifically targeted at identifying areas in the North sea where improved oil recovery techniques might be applied.

There is still a great deal to do. Industry, too, recognises the need for change. Only recently, Alan Booth, Managing Director of EnCana (UK) Ltd., outlined a number of areas in which industry must quickly adopt new approaches if it is to ensure that it gets the full benefits of what the North sea has to offer. This year, PILOT and the Government will focus on concluding the new procedures that will improve third-party access to infrastructure and on finding ways to enhance oil and gas recovery from brownfields. We know that the production gap exists, but the UKCS is still thriving and we are committed to working with the industry to overcome production barriers and to find innovative solutions for the future.

Prisoners (Mental Health)

2 pm

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): We are here to discuss an important subject this afternoon, notwithstanding the alternative attractions: some people are listening to the speeches on the Budget, and others are talking to the media. I particularly wanted to have this discussion following the annual report of Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons for England and Wales for 2002–03. I tabled an early-day motion earlier this year welcoming the report, but also calling for an urgent review of how those with mental illnesses are treated.

Hon. Members will almost certainly have witnessed the sad results of girls self-harming in prison, and I have a tragic memory of visiting the special unit in Feltham young offenders institution for young men with severe mental health conditions. The dedication of the staff was impressive, but that memory stays with me. Prison suicides currently average two a week.

The chief inspector of prisons, Anne Owers, suggested that the most serious incidents of self-harm, as well as deaths in custody, should be the subject of official investigations. In her annual report she said that the inquiries should not only ensure that help is focused on suicidal inmates, but should identify inmates who are so mentally ill that they should not be in prison. She suggested that a new network of mental health units should be set up to provide support and treatment for hundreds of disturbed offenders who could be detained there instead of in prison, where overcrowding is having an insidious and chronic effect.

Today the prison population stands at more than 75,000. The vast majority of the men and women locked up in our jails have mental health problems. Recent research by the Office for National Statistics found that seven out of 10 prisoners suffer from two or more mental health disorders. In many cases those include problems with substance abuse. Therefore, as I speak, more than 50,000 people who are mentally ill are locked up in our jails. They are supported by staff who are dedicated, but are not always trained psychiatric nurses. Many are trying to do their best in very difficult circumstances. One prison officer recently told a national newspaper:

"We are no longer prison officers, we are mental health workers. We are enthusiastic, but we are only amateurs."

I do not like to call those people amateurs, because they are professionals, but they are not fully trained to deal with the full range of mental health problems.

First, there are the seriously and acutely mentally ill. Martin Narey, the head of the recently formed national offenders management service, which we were discussing this morning, says that at any one time there are some 5,000 prisoners who should be immediately transferred to secure psychiatric settings. It is difficult, verging on impossible, to provide the right kind of environment for those people in prisons. Prisons are not by their nature therapeutic environments, so they are not places where prisoners can be compulsorily treated. They deal with extremely disturbed people, and prison staff struggle, and do a terrific job, simply trying to contain the degree of illness and danger.

Compared with 10 or even five years ago, the transfer of prisoners who are sectioned under the Mental Health Act 1983 to secure NHS facilities is improving. It is usually possible to do it within three months of diagnosis. Even in those three months, a prisoner's circumstances can deteriorate dramatically. The situation is not as good as it should be. The chief inspector of prisons pointed out:

"The arrival of mental health in-reach teams in many prisons has been of benefit both to prisoners and staff, enabling those with chronic mental disorder to be better managed on the wings."

I do not wish to undermine the improvements that have been made and the excellent ongoing work. Today's debate is about what more can and should be done in our prisons.

In parts of the country in which mental health trusts are unable to find room, deeply troubled prisoners can remain festering in prison for many months, locked up for many hours and remaining a danger to themselves and to other prisoners and staff. Many seriously mentally ill prisoners are not sectioned because, as they suffer from personality disorders, they are not considered to be treatable. A staggering 64 per cent. of male and 50 per cent. of female sentenced prisoners have a personality disorder. They are not always being accepted into mental health institutions, and those that are will sometimes be returned to prisons because they are too dangerous and difficult to deal with in special hospitals. Governors are reluctant to take those prisoners.

As is highlighted by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons, there is a policy in the Prison Service shockingly called "sale or return", whereby prisoners are sent by one governor to another on the understanding that if they misbehave, they will be returned. That is not the way in which we should deal with people who may be difficult but who have great needs and are usually damaged. A whole category of prisoners is on a merry-go-round, although "merry" is hardly the right word to use. They go from one prison to another for weeks at a time, usually to provide respite for prison staff. That does little to help them, but instead exacerbates their mental condition.

In a prison, disturbed men and women are often held away from the main wing, either in the health care unit or in special segregation units. As the independent monitoring board—the prison watchdog appointed by the Home Office—recently reported to the Home Secretary of Her Majesty's prison at High Down in Surrey:

"It is distressing to watch mentally ill men being shuttled between the segregation and health care units. Their condition is adversely affected by segregation, but their behaviour cannot be adequately managed in our standard prison health care unit."

There are also levels of mental disorder associated with substance abuse. I do not discount the advances made in recent years for prisoners with drug problems, but there is still a long way to go. The Government proudly tell us that more than 40,000 detoxifications take place across the Prison Service each year, but there are question marks over the quality of those detoxifications. How many of them took place in health care centres rather than on prison landings? How many detoxified prisoners received follow-up, and of what kind?

[Mrs. Annette L. Brooke]

The Home Office also says that more than 40,000 initial assessments were made last year under the CARAT programme for prisoners with drug problems. But how many of those initial assessments led to the full process of counselling, assessment, referral, advice and through-care? I do not underestimate the extent of what I am identifying and I realise that it cannot be solved overnight, but it is right to outline the whole situation.

How many prisoners complete treatment and rehabilitation programmes? How many prisoners have access to treatment and support services on release, and with what delay? Is there any information about the number of prisoners with dual diagnosis, and what co-ordinated Prison Service provisions address their needs? Those questions are all being asked by prison reform groups such as the Prison Reform Trust, but the Home Office has not provided satisfactory answers—perhaps the Minister will be able to help today.

The situation is compounded by the severe overcrowding in jails across the country. According to the Prison Reform Trust, 85 of the 138 jails in England and Wales are overcrowded and more than 16,500 prisoners have to double up in cells designed for one person. The large local jails up and down the country have in effect become vast transit camps, where tens of thousands of prisoners are processed each year. There is a danger, because the system is so overstretched, that staff will fail to identify and monitor vulnerable and the mentally unstable prisoners.

We are already seeing the consequences of cramming mentally ill people into overcrowded jails. Incidents of self-harm among prisoners have increased fivefold since 1998. Last year, there were 17,300 such incidents recorded. Among female prisoners the level of self-harm is particularly alarming. A far higher proportion of women injure themselves repeatedly. Many of them will have suffered domestic violence and sexual abuse. For them, and for the many desperate men in our prisons, self-harm is a way to release their mental pain. As one former prisoner wrote in a recent report by the Prison Reform Trust:

"During the two-and-a-half years of my incarceration I was to discover the depths of despair one can fall into, believing I was losing my mind, believing I was dead, believing I was buried alive, believing I would never be free. I learnt about self-harm, physically and emotionally, I learnt how to survive, yet at the same time how it feels to want to die every day . . . Prison is not a place for the mentally ill and too many . . . are there already that should not be."

In her annual report, Anne Owers says:

"Women in prison are at ever greater risk of suicide and self-harm. There were 14 self-inflicted deaths this year, and six of them occurred within the first eight days in prison . . . This places local prisons, which receive women directly from the courts, in the front line. The key elements they need to have in place are effective strategies on self-harm and bullying, effective detoxification, proper mental health support and a sufficiently active regime. None of the three local prisons that we reported on this year met all these requirements; though between them they showed that it is possible to have effective practice in all these areas."

Although there were many worrying statements in the annual report, there was some light. There are those pockets of good practice—if only we could spread them more.

The chief inspector goes on to say:

"Proper detoxification is a key part of safer custody. Holloway had extremely good detoxification, which we say should be a model of good practice. But sadly it is not a model that is followed elsewhere. In our inspection of Styal, we found that inadequate detoxification severely affected women's physical and mental health and future chances. We noted that the Governor's two bids for additional resources for detoxification had been rejected. Our report was unequivocal: 'Our strongest recommendation is that drug detoxification programmes should be introduced immediately'. It is inexcusable, that, 18 months after our inspection, this was still not the case and, in the interim, six women drug users had died there within a month of admission . . . Styal had no proper detoxification unit. We describe women, in their early days there, fitting and vomiting in their cells, with staff unable to do more than observe and try to alleviate their distress. This had profound and damaging effects, both on women's safety and on their chance of effective education and training."

We have recently heard that the successful therapeutic project at Winchester is to be uprooted and transferred to Her Majesty's prison Send as part of emergency plans to find extra spaces and avoid holding male prisoners in police cells. That rushed plan is surely a symptom of the crisis in the Prison Service. It is difficult to imagine that those vulnerable women will not be affected by the move. The overcrowding crisis is now so great that the Government perpetually seem to be running behind the problems.

I welcome the strategy for women prisoners, which was announced on the same day as the announcement about moving the special unit at Winchester. It has long been argued that women prisoners need different treatment, and it is a sad reflection on society that the number of women prisoners has increased by 173 per cent. in the last 10 years. Their sentences may be short but the women are very vulnerable, and it is a problem for them to be located far away from their homes and families. About 50 per cent. of women are more than 50 miles from their families, and a quarter are more than 100 miles away. There are different circumstances, but it is worrying that women are receiving more severe sentences than they would have been given a decade ago for the same offences.

We must get the right message across about sentencing policy. I am not convinced that the Government always give clear signals to the justice system. There are many good schemes in the Criminal Justice Act 2003: more community service, custody plus, custody minus, and intermittent jail sentences. However, women are still going to prison when other settings would be more appropriate.

Research by Young Minds concludes that more than 1 million children have a mental disorder and half of all children who have been involved with the police have a mental disorder. That is not to say that all children with a mental disorder offend, but it is important to expand children's mental health services rapidly as a preventive strategy to help to such vulnerable children.

I welcome the fact that the Government have invested heavily in child and adolescent mental health services. We might speculate that some of the problems that we face might not be quite so desperate if that investment had been made earlier. In my former life as a councillor, I was frequently frustrated by the lack of money for children's mental health; although the Government have done an enormous amount, there is much more to be done. I am straying from Home Office to health issues, but one reason why I wanted this debate was because we need joined-up thinking to tackle the issue from all sides.

Why have prisons become dumping grounds for the mentally ill? The answer is simple: according to the mental health charity Mind, 50,000 psychiatric beds have been lost over 20 years. There is nowhere for people to go when they have a mental breakdown, and that often leads to prison for people who commit minor offences. The courts are remanding increasing numbers of mentally ill offenders in custody to await pre-sentence psychiatric reports, because there are not sufficient places available in bail hostels.

In addition, there is a shortage of court diversion schemes so that offenders who are acutely ill or at risk of suicide can be given hospital places or the treatment they need. The solution in these tragic circumstances is not to turn prisons into treatment centres on the cheap; the solution lies outside the criminal justice system.

So much offending by mentally ill people is really a public health, rather than a criminal justice, issue. The problem will certainly not be solved by cramming more people into jails or by investing in another prison building programme, as it costs £36,500 a year to keep a person behind bars. The solution is to provide more services for mental health care, drug treatment, court diversion, and mental health support and supervision centres throughout the country. With that investment, surely we could find the money for the treatment that our mentally ill people need? Why should we continually throw so much money at our prison system, when the more prisons we build, the more demands to send people to jail fill the tabloids? Does the Minister accept that we must invest to save not only money but people, and their self-esteem?

The World Health Organisation has highlighted the link between access to physical education, work and the arts—all of which are restricted in prisons, especially at times of overcrowding—and mental health. We have had a lot of information about prisons in which the inmates are kept in their cells for up to 23 hours a day. That is all part of the crisis of a shortage of staff and space. We have a self-perpetuating crisis of overcrowded prisons, including the presence of prisoners with severe mental health conditions, who obviously absorb a lot of staff time; meanwhile, we are making the mental health conditions for other prisoners worse. That vicious circle must be broken.

I would like to see a clear strategy from the Government on mental health, because it is the biggest area that needs to be tackled to improve our Prison Service. We need genuine rehabilitation for those who offend, along with the punishment that is clearly needed for all offences—we accept that there must be longer prison sentences for those who have been involved in violent or sexual crimes. However, we also need good sense, because our prison system is not working. There might be small cuts here or there in reoffending, but I have not seen any figure of less than 50 per cent. for that, although there may have been large percentage reductions. There is a revolving-door phenomenon. When people go in through that door, those who may have entered without a mental health condition can develop one because of prison conditions. Worse still, those who should have hope in their lives are not receiving the education or support that they need, and they are not engaging in rehabilitation activities.

There is so much to be done. For those with severe mental health conditions and drug addictions, it is important to invest to ensure that there is total through-care. I hope that the Minister will tell us about both the short-term plans, which I hope are not just quick fixes, and the long-term strategy, because we have a real crisis. There are already tragedies of suicide and violence in prisons, and it will not be much longer before there is a bigger tragedy. We need action and a long-term strategy that will address the problems that I have outlined today.

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) on securing this debate. I realise that an interesting debate on the Budget is taking place in the main Chamber, but it is still disappointing that so few Members are present in this Chamber.

As my hon. Friend said, the problem of mental health in prisons is avoidable and can be resolved. We are talking about some of the most vulnerable people in our society. I have often found on my travels that people who have been in prison have also been homeless or have experienced all sorts of suffering in socially deprived areas. They are people with a lot of baggage. We need to find ways to help that hardcore group of people. They have problems—and, to be honest, many of them create problems, too. Mental health services have been neglected for many years, and it is to the Government's credit that they have put their money where their mouth is and begun to address the problem that they inherited.

There is a pitiful lack of resources for helping people with mental health problems inside prisons. I remember going to Shrewsbury prison, where excellent staff attention is given to looking out for the obvious problems of the prisoners who go quiet and do not express themselves, and for those with a background of mental health problems. It also has a good counselling room, where staff can try to talk to prisoners. However, the fact remains that there are too many people in prison who should not be there.

The statistics alone are worrying, and even they belie the real truth of the heartache—the details of the cases behind the numbers. None the less, they show that in 1992 there were 41 self-inflicted deaths in our prisons, and that by 1997 there were 68; the latest available annual figure is 94. The Minister will probably say that the number of people in prison has dramatically increased for a variety of reasons, and that is right; in 1992 there were 45,817 people in our prisons on average, and the latest figure is 74,960. However, if the proportion is worked out on a pro rata basis—per 100,000 prison population, let us say—there has still been an increase: the latest statistics say that 125 people per 100,000 in the prison population commit suicide, but in 1997 that figure was 111, and in 1992 it was 89. The trend is going up, over and above any increase in the prison population. People in British prisons are now 13 times more likely to commit suicide than people in the outside world.

[Mr. Paul Marsden]

Something is seriously wrong. There is a breakdown in the way in which our overstretched public services are dealing with this issue, because at the same time the statistics in the wider community are getting better. The Government and the Minister can rightly take credit for that. Extra resources are going into the wider mental health services and the suicide rate is decreasing; it has come down from almost 11 per 100,000 to about nine. That is good.

However, although resources are being spent and that is creating some success, not enough is being done. On 9 February, The Guardian reported:

"Incidents of self-harm among prisoners in England and Wales have increased fivefold since 1998".

Those new figures were revealed in response to a parliamentary question from Lord Lester, QC. The annual report of HM chief inspector of prisons for England and Wales 2002–03 states:

"Mental health continues to be a major problem in prisons, with a large number of prisoners who have either acute or chronic mental disorders. We have noticed some improvement in moving seriously mentally ill patients to NHS care".

The Government were right to do that. The report continues:

"Nevertheless, three months"—

the target time for assessment—

"is a long time for prisons to hold seriously ill, often potentially violent, prisoners that they cannot treat and who deteriorate visibly. The regimes available in healthcare centres rarely provided the support and stimulation that such patients need."

Likewise, on 9 February in The Birmingham Post, Professor David Wilson of the university of Central England said:

"Prisons seem to be for the homeless, people with social problems and the excluded. It is a disgrace to our nation. They are for locking people up, not treating people with mental problems, no matter how many times they offend."

He warned that if prisons continued to house the mentally ill they would lose the public's respect, and I think that he is right.

My hon. Friend mentioned problems at Styal prison in Cheshire. Five of the six women who died there last year were in the induction wing, which was found to be "isolating and forbidding". There was inadequate provision for mental health treatment and there were inadequate facilities for dealing with drug-dependent prisoners. I am sure that the Minister will say that action is being taken on that, and that there will be extra resources. Nevertheless, surely we have to change the procedures and expand capacity—possibly in the community, certainly in secure mental health hospitals—to make sure that such people, who should be treated, do not constantly go in and out of prison. That is counter-productive in every way.

The present situation produces many problems on the streets, as I saw recently when I spent an evening on patrol with special constables in Shrewsbury. I was with them between half-past 5 in the evening until half-past 11, when they finished the patrol, and the first four call-outs were all to deal with problems on the streets caused by people with mental health problems who were known to the police.

The policemen told me that in each case, all they could do was to calm the people down and move them on; there was simply no provision for getting mental health workers out in the evening. The police pointed out two individuals who had criminal records and who had previously been to prison. It is only right and proper that we make those responsible for crimes and for their actions to pay for their actions, but there are clearly too many people on our streets and in our prisons who are not necessarily responsible. Prison is the wrong place to send them.

Finally, the Prison Reform Trust has said:

"One in five men in prison, and nearly 40 per cent. of women, have attempted suicide at some time—rates that are much higher than in the general public. At some stage in their sentence most prisoners are going to experience personal distress, mental health problems, drug dependency or a lack of family support—all factors which increase the risk of suicide."

With almost two people a week now committing suicide in our prisons, it is time that this terrible tragedy came to an end.

2.33 pm

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) on securing the debate. Often prisons and matters to do with mental health are seen as a Cinderella issue. However, this debate is not the only one we have had today; it follows the debate this morning on the soon-to-be-established national offenders management service. That debate set the background for the new structure that the Government are putting in place, and I hope that the Minister will make it clear that one urgent priority for that new system will be to address some of the issues that my hon. Friend has raised; the two subjects work closely alongside each other.

My hon. Friend was right to focus on some of the figures involved. There are 5,000 individuals with serious mental health issues in prison, whom all the professionals recognise should not be in prison. Beyond those 5,000, there are a considerable number—seven out of 10 prisoners—who have some form of mental illness. Those are damning figures indeed.

My hon. Friend mentioned what took place at Feltham some time ago. I visited Feltham a couple of weeks ago and I would like to put on record the enormous progress that has been made at that institution. I was extremely impressed with what I saw—the dedication of the staff and the way in which they have turned round an organisation that had the problems to which my hon. Friend referred. The institution—touch wood—now has a regime that has calmed things down and is making enormous progress. I was extremely impressed with the work that they do there.

My hon. Friend made a damning point about the cost of keeping individuals in prison: £350 a night. Imagine how that money could be invested in tackling mental health problems. It is a very large sum. If we could put all that into solving some of the problems that she mentioned, that would surely be better value for money.

I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) for his contribution, in which he made three or four telling points. He drew attention to the increases in the prison population, and mentioned an extremely damning figure, which I had not heard before: people in prison are 13 times more likely to commit suicide than those outside. One would have thought that people would be less likely to commit suicide in a secure institution, and that they would be secured from that vulnerability and put into a system that would make them safer. It is an absolute disgrace that they are 13 times more likely to commit suicide.

I concur entirely with my hon. Friend about the experience of going out with the police on a Friday or Saturday night. I did that in my constituency too, and it was amazing how the police knew the names of all the individuals. Sometimes they even knew the medication that some of them should be taking, and were asking them whether they had taken it. On the streets on a Friday or Saturday night, the police were almost like mental health experts themselves. Without that knowledge, people can often misinterpret behaviour, not understanding that there is a mental health reason behind it. One can easily see how such disturbing behaviour can lead individuals into prison. My hon. Friend was right to raise that concern.

The background to this debate, as has been said, is the increasing prison population. I do not want to go into the issues behind that, other than to put on the record the fact that we are heading towards a crisis. We know that the Government are trying to juggle the figures every week, to avoid police cells having to be used to cope with the numbers involved. Something must be done in the system to tackle the growing numbers of folk in prison, as prison cannot do the job that we would all like it to do. The problem manifests itself in move away from the concept of a community prison to prisons that have no connection with the community in which the prisoners are held. Prisoners are always being moved up and down the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole raised the case of my own constituency prison, Winchester, where the decision has recently been taken to close the women's prison and to move the therapeutic community experiment that was taking place there—the only experiment of its kind in Europe. I have visited it, and the concept of giving the prisoners some responsibility is exciting. They set their daily timetable and consider the prison's agenda and the tasks that take place there. Most importantly, individual prisoners start to have some responsibility for how their lives are run. Such issues are all too often taken out of their control when they go into an institution, and when they leave prison, not having had responsibility for themselves can cause great problems.

That is excellent work; I acknowledge that the Minister has been helpful in keeping me posted on the issue, and I do not criticise him for his communications. He has reassured me that the unit will move to a different location, and stay together as much as possible. He recognises, as I do, the importance of keeping as many of the women and staff that started the experiment together when they move. When he responds, perhaps he will be able to update me on negotiations with staff, as we obviously want to persuade the staff who are taking part in the experiment to relocate, at least in the short term, to keep it going. However, the point remains that moving prisoners around the country like that cannot be good for the purposes that prison is supposed to serve.

The debate is not about prison and reoffending, but something is wrong with a system that allows 87 per cent. of 18 to 21-year-olds to reoffend. It is a national scandal that 87 per cent. of the individuals in that captive audience come out and commit a crime again. The figure is 57 per cent. for the rest of the prison population—something is clearly going wrong.

We cannot debate education and training today, but we must do more to ensure that individuals leave prison with the ability to read and write, and the skills to get a job. However, none of that can happen while the size of the prison population is going out of control and the staff are under increasing pressure. The prison officers to whom I speak about issues related to prisoners with mental health say, "Frankly, Mark, it's enough for us to be able to get through the day, to make sure the prison is secure and that we don't have riots or other serious incidents on our hands. Don't talk to us about prisoners with mental health or health problems, or about trying to get more education and training. That's an ideal that we could move towards, but we're trying to survive from day to day."

Others have rightly mentioned the chief inspector of prisons' report—the language used by the inspector is strong, and I am glad that she took some trouble to raise concerns about the mental health of prisoners. I will quote one example that the inspector gave in connection with my local prison. About mental health problems at Winchester prison, the report says:

"Patients had a very impoverished day, with very little activity: only out of their rooms for two to three hours at most on many days. Disturbed young men should have some space and human contact."

The conditions in which we hold ordinary prisoners—who often stay in their cells for 23 hours a day—are unacceptable, but those conditions are particularly acute for prisoners who have mental health problems. If someone is in that sort of environment without contact, without exercise or sport or anything purposeful to do, that will not help with the condition that they had when they entered prison. Indeed, it is likely to make that condition worse.

The inspector discussed some examples of good practice, and the mental health inreach teams that have been put in place in several prisons. Could the Minister give us an update on the progress in establishing those teams? How many are there, and what sort of progress is being made putting them into as many prisons as possible? Those teams have a role to play in solving the problem.

The inspector also raised the question of assessment, and the importance of ensuring that when someone arrives in prison an assessment takes place quickly. The target is that the assessment should take place within three months. As my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said, that is not a particularly effective target, because someone in that condition should not have to go for three months without any proper assessment.

However, I want to draw the Minister's attention to an assessment that should happen even before that—the one that happens to a prisoner in the first five or six hours after they arrive at the prison. I am extremely concerned that the assessment procedure for a prisoner who has just arrived remains inadequate. That is not necessarily the fault of the Prison Service; it may be the fault of the back-up system. If someone arrives at a prison, it is important that medical notes and any case history or doctor's evidence are made available as soon as possible. I know that in some of the cases of suicide that occur in prisons, which often happen in the first 24 hours, that crucial back-up information has not been made known to the prison. I hope that the Minister can tell us what can be done to improve not the three-month assessment of prisoners' mental health needs, which is more complicated, but the assessment within 24 hours, so that any indications on a medical note or a doctor's note that there could be mental health problems are spotted quickly. We know that those first 24 hours are critical.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole mentioned the work of the children's charity Young Minds. In a briefing that Young Minds gave to a number of MPs a couple of days ago, it said that some 95 per cent. of young prisoners have a mental health disorder. It seems that among young prisoners and young offenders, problems with mental health are more acute. I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that and will see what can be done for those particularly vulnerable groups.

Both my hon. Friends mentioned suicide figures and self-harm, and I do not wish to rehearse those issues. However, there is another set of figures that I am concerned about: those to do with attempted suicide. The Minister gave me an answer to a question on that issue a couple of Mondays ago. We know that suicide and self-harm rates are increasing in prisons, but I was concerned to find that in 2002, some 154 prisoners were resuscitated. That means that they were in such a vulnerable state that they were trying to commit suicide. Last year, 211 prisoners were resuscitated. Those figures are alarming: they could so easily have added to the suicide rate.

Obviously, the good news is that those people were resuscitated. Fortunately, something happened in the system to prevent them from committing suicide when they were so close to doing so. The bad news is that we need to look at the self-harm, suicide and resuscitation figures as a whole, and they show that there is an increasing problem with suicides and the threat of suicides in prison. In response to my question, the Minister said that there was a three-year programme to develop policies and practices designed to reduce prisoner suicide and manage self-harm in prisons. He said that the results of that programme and research would inform future suicide prevention and self-harm management strategy. Will he let me know when that three-year programme is due to conclude, and what early indications he has received of the kind of programmes that the Government will put in place following that?

I have a final question about mental health in prison, relating to the practice of DNA testing people in prison. I understand that the Government's policy involved a prisoner DNA sampling exercise. That took place between February and September 2003. The aim was to take a DNA sample from all convicted offenders held in prison or mental health establishments. I am slightly concerned, and wanted reassurance, about the way in which DNA tests are carried out on those with mental health problems. I understand that people held in mental hospitals who have been found unfit to plead or have been acquitted of an offence on grounds of insanity are also included in the DNA testing process. Will the Minister run the rationale for that past the House, and give us reassurance about exactly how the process takes place? Obviously, that is a sensitive issue, given that those concerned have been found unfit or insane.

What is the way forward? I think that we should start to recognise that prison is not like hospital. If a person is ill and has something wrong with them, and they go to hospital, something happens in hospital to put that right; they go into a bed, have drugs or an operation, and come out better. In contrast, if a person goes to prison, although something is wrong with them, nothing happens to them in prison to put it right. That is the opposite of the way in which the hospital service works. People stay in prison and do not come out—and when they do come out, unfortunately, a large majority of them are not better, and have to go straight back to prison.

Is it not our aim that the philosophy and principles that apply to the treatment of those going into hospital should also apply to those going into prison? That must be the overarching aim towards which the Government should move. However, they also need to recognise that prison may not be the most appropriate place to deal with those with mental health problems. That means moving towards more community prisons, so that those with mental health problems are near local services, and perhaps family back-up and support, which can be invaluable. That is better than family and relatives having to travel miles to visit such people. It also means reducing overcrowding in prisons, and giving prison staff responsibility and more space, so that they can look after those with mental health issues and get involved with those problems.

That approach means understanding why people with mental health problems are sentenced in such a way. Most importantly of all, it means understanding why those with mental health problems are committing the crimes that lead to sentencing. I accept that that goes way beyond the Minister's remit and involves general cross-cutting policy. Surely at the heart of the issue is the need to understand why people with such problems get into the crime culture in the first place. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole for raising this important issue, and I hope that the Minister can tackle some of the points raised and find a positive way forward.

2.50 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) on raising this debate. The Minister and I have spent a considerable amount of time in this Chamber today. This is our second debate, this morning's having been on the national offender management service, and the two subjects are interrelated. Indeed, we could have run one debate into the other, which would have given us a welcome opportunity to consider all the relevant issues.

I, too, am sad that there is such a dearth of Members in this Chamber today, but as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there are other attractions today in the main Chamber. Some of us have not even managed to have our lunch yet, as we have been running between the two Chambers. Sometimes I wonder whether Westminster Hall could not be re-timetabled to allow us to have some normality in our lives.

The subject chosen by the hon. Lady is not glamorous or often highlighted, as it almost seems taboo to discuss mental health. However, one in four people will suffer with mental health problems at some stage in their lives, so everyone in this Chamber will know someone—a friend, relative or colleague—who has had mental health problems, whether in their early or their later years.

Mental health issues cover a broad spectrum, from post-natal depression to psychotic behaviour and from Alzheimer's to schizophrenia, so we are talking about the full range of illness. Whatever incidence is found in society at large, it is concentrated in the prison population, and whereas once we hid our mentally ill in asylums, we now find them in our prisons.

The Minister will be familiar with the Prison Reform Trust, as it does such sterling work in this area. It provides us with some grim statistics, which possibly need some updating—I hope that Minister will be able to fill in the gaps. Most prisoners have significant mental health problems, and some 72 per cent. of male and 70 per cent. of female sentenced prisoners suffer from two or more mental health disorders. Neurotic and personality disorders are particularly prevalent: some 40 per cent. of male and 63 per cent. of female sentenced prisoners have a neurotic disorder, which is more than three times the general population. Some 64 per cent. of male and 50 per cent. of female sentenced prisoners have a personality disorder.

I want also to consider the position of older prisoners, as 85 per cent. of prisoners over 60 suffer from chronic illness, and I hope that the Minister can shed some light on how many prisoners currently in custody suffer from Alzheimer's or other debilitating diseases that generally affect people later in life. A significant number of prisoners suffer from a psychotic disorder—7 per cent. of male and 14 per cent. of female prisoners exhibit signs of one, which is 14 to 23 times the level in the general population.

Other hon. Members have spoken about the increase in reported incidents of self-harm among prisoners and the alarming statistics on prisoner suicides. I understand that there have been 27 suicides in our prison system already this year. I hope that the Minister will comment about the change in how suicides are investigated, as they will soon be investigated by the prisons ombudsman. It would be helpful to know whether, in the course of those investigations, the ombudsman will consider the mental health of the deceased and the treatment that they received, or did not receive, when they entered the prison system. That is a sensitive and painful subject for the families of those who have committed suicide, but we may be able to learn some lessons and adjust our practices and procedures in the prison system to ensure that more prisoners do not lose their lives.

A high proportion of prisoners have been treated in psychiatric hospitals. Some 20 per cent. of male and 15 per cent. of female sentenced prisoners have previously been admitted for in-patient psychiatric care. The Prison Reform Trust has done some work on the female prison population, and as many as 40 per cent. of the women whom they interviewed reported having received help or treatment for mental, nervous, or emotional problems in the year before going to prison. There must be some early indicators that we may be missing.

I hope that that sort of information will inform the way in which we handle women in the prison system. There is no doubt that there has been a vast increase in women going to prison. That must be considered closely, because if women are imprisoned there are tremendous social on-costs and implications, particularly if they have families. As we all know, if a woman in prison has a family, she loses her home and her children go into care, and a cycle is set up whereby the children, too, can end up in the criminal justice system. The Minister must reassure me, and others, that he will carefully consider the mental health issues as they apply to women.

There is another alarming statistic from the Prison Reform Trust, upon which I hope that the Minister will throw some light. Research suggests that people are twice as likely to be refused treatment for mental health problems in prison as outside. I understand that the Government's social exclusion unit concluded that mental health care in prisons was in significant need of improvement. That is an understatement, bearing in mind the number of prisoners who have been identified as suffering from significant mental health problems. If a high proportion—some 50 per cent.—are turned down when they ask for mental health treatment in prison, we have an even bigger problem than I thought.

There is a shortage of mental health professionals working in the prison system, as I think everybody would acknowledge. I acknowledge that progress is being made—certainly, that seems so from the answers to my questions to the Department of Health—and there are targets for increasing the number of mental health professionals in prisons, although I am not entirely convinced that those targets have been met, and that the numbers are fully up to the levels anticipated by the Department.

It is troubling to think that anyone who is mentally ill and has a brush with the law could find themselves in surroundings that are almost Dickensian and are certainly inadequate for the treatment that they require. I believe that I am right in saying that facilities often amount to little more than sick bays with limited primary care provision. The assessment of a prisoner on his or her arrival at prison typically takes just a few minutes, and is often conducted by a retired GP or a locum, who may not have specialist knowledge of mental health. The level of training of staff does not always match the complexity of the conditions with which prisoners present.

Earlier, I briefly met some of the representatives from the Salvation Army, which does some sterling work in this area. They look at a throughput of some 60,000 people and have identified the complexity of need. They are finding that some of their methods are helping to deal with the complex needs of mentally ill ex-prisoners and people still in custody.

The report from John Reed, the medical inspector at Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons, states:

"A period in prison should present an opportunity to detect, diagnose, and treat mental illness in a population . . . hard to engage with NHS services. This could bring major benefits not only to patients but to the wider community by ensuring continuity of care and reducing the risk of re-offending on release."

The fact that that opportunity is not grasped is an indictment of the current system. In Nursing Times in 2000, John Reed said something that strikes horror in all our hearts: that many prisoners

"are quietly mad behind their cell door and are not getting any treatment. Care for mentally disordered offenders in prison is a disgrace."

That was written in 2000, but we still need to reform many areas of the Prison Service as a matter of urgency. Research is still required to determine the impact that the prison environment, and in particular, overcrowding, to which I referred in this morning's debate, have on mental health. As we have the luxury of more time in this debate, I hope that the Minister will update us on the latest figures for the prison population, which exceeds 75,000. As the Prison Service is in crisis in terms of numbers, will he tell us what arrangements have been made and how many police forces are on standby for Operation Safeguard? As the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) noted, the police have to take the overflow from the system, and that worries all hon. Members.

I was also worried to read "Securing Our Future Health: Taking a Long-Term View", the interim report by Derek Wanless. Part of that dealt with the costs of mental illness and the savings that could be made by introducing a better system, and it says:

"It is difficult to estimate the exact value of potential savings, but it does not seem unreasonable to assume that there might be a 5 per cent. reduction in the costs of mental illness and a 2 per cent. reduction in the costs of crime . . . giving a net saving across government as a whole of some £3.1 billion a year."

That may be so if the nettle is grasped and the problem dealt with as Derek Wanless recommends. What will the potential savings be if the system is improved, perhaps along the lines that the Minister started to explain this morning, but did not quite finish?

I appreciate that some progress has been made. I spoke to Steve Gannon at Holloway prison, where he has made great strides in the treatment of mentally ill prisoners over a very short period. He told me, and I believe it, that the inreach teams have made a big impact, mostly because they came in with a little money. Having resources attached to the inreach teams works wonders.

However, there are still tremendous difficulties. For example, it is difficult to allocate key workers to a prisoner, because prisoners are often moved around the country. Will the Minister comment on the reports that women prisoners are being moved out of Winchester and Edmunds Hill as we speak, because of overcrowding, so that male prisoners can be accommodated? How will those individuals receive the continuing support that is needed? If prisoners are moved around the country, they will be away from their home, friends and support systems. There is an obvious social dimension to mental illness, and if support systems are not accessible, the individuals involved are less likely to benefit from interventions, and the outcomes will be poorer.

I am also worried about the transfer of the responsibility for commissioning to primary care trusts. How will that fit in with the new structure of the national offender management service? Will that money be ring-fenced, or will it go to options that are more attractive to the PCTs than mental health in prisons? I hope that the Minister will reassure us about that, because I am thinking particularly about the pressure under which PCTs operate at the moment. Many of them are turning in deficit budgets. The transfer of responsibility and the dedication of that money is extremely important to improving the conditions of prisoners with mental health problems.

There appear to be limited resources to identify prisoners with learning difficulties. Those prisoners have a number of problems, and need to be identified at an early stage, not least for their own protection in some instances. What resources are available to identify them?

Starting a process is always difficult. I appreciate that there have been targets for the number of staff working in mental health teams in prisons, and a number of my questions have been answered. However, the nine-week basic training that prison officers receive is not only cursory, but almost wholly inadequate.

I am particularly worried about the lack of information on the treatment of mental health disorders in each prison establishment. I asked the Secretary of State for Health how many people were employed to treat such disorders in each prison establishment, but I was told:

"This information is not available."

The answer continued:

"By March 2004 we expect to meet the NHS Plan commitment for 300 additional staff to provide specialist community type mental health services to over 5,000 prisoners."—[Official Report, 23 February 2004; Vol. 418, c. 289W.]

If, however, we do not have the information on how many staff work in the area, I lack confidence in the way in which the Government are handling the prison system.

The enormous problem that we are discussing could well be exacerbated by the major reorganisation being carried out by the Government. Once again, we look to the Minister to reassure us that he is in charge of the situation—that he has the necessary information at his fingertips and an action plan to deal with it.

3.6 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): This is indeed the second time that some of us have attended a debate in Westminster Hall today, and the first debate was on similar issues. I admire the capacity of the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) not only to participate in debates, but to ask the Prime Minister a question, meet the Salvation Army, and, no doubt, table another half dozen questions to me for written answer. I pay tribute to her energy.

I compliment the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) on obtaining this very important debate. She spoke this afternoon as she always does, whether in Committee or on the Floor of the House—with great care, knowledge and concern. It does her great credit that she brings such issues to our attention in that way. She asked many questions, some of which I hope to be able to answer during this debate. On those that I do not answer, I will write to her, as I will to other hon. Members.

Behind some of the hon. Lady's factual questions lay deeper questions about how correctional services are organised, who prison is for, and how we can effect changes in sentencing so that people who need and deserve to be in prison are in prison, while people who can be dealt with in the community are in the community. Those issues were also at the heart of the debate that we had earlier about the national offender management service. The discussion will continue, and I want to encourage it. I want people to participate in it not only in Parliament but throughout the work force, because we must get the system right. Too many people who are in prison today should not be there, and could be dealt with more effectively in the community. Whether or not they have mental health problems, or are first-time offenders, or non-dangerous people, more of them should be in the community, and that is the direction in which the Government want to move.

A number of statistics were used about the prevalence of mental illness in prisons. I shall add two statistics that show the seriousness of the challenge that we face: 90 per cent. of prisoners have at least one significant mental health problem, and 20 per cent. have four of the five major mental health disorders. This is, therefore, a very serious issue, and not one that the Home Office or I, as the Minister responsible, seek to shy away from. We are facing the issue head on, and trying to devise solutions.

The overall aim of the programme to improve health services for prisoners, which we began in 2000, is to provide prisoners with access to the same range and quality of health services as the general public expect to receive from the NHS. There should be equality of access to health care whether one is in prison or in the community. Of course, ensuring that prisoners have access to good health care can improve their physical and mental health. In so doing, we increase the extent to which they can participate in education, work on offending behaviour, and other aspects of prison life. In turn, that improves the potential for their successful rehabilitation and resettlement in the community.

"Changing the Outlook", the Government's strategy for modernising mental health services in prisons, was published in December 2001. It set out a vision of where prison mental health care was expected to be in three to five years' time and identified the steps that would need to be taken if that vision were to be realised. "Changing the Outlook" was published against a widespread consensus that the care and treatment of prisoners with mental disorders was in need of drastic improvement. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole referred to the independent monitoring board for a particular prison. I receive reports from all the independent monitoring boards for prisons throughout the country, and they still regularly raise the issue of the mental health of the prisoners for whom they have responsibility.

It was also acknowledged in "Changing the Outlook" that the best way to achieve and maintain an improvement in prison health services in general is for prisons and the national health service to work ever closer together. I have been asked this afternoon about the move to the commissioning by primary care trusts of health services for our prisons. I am pleased to confirm that from April this year, 18 primary care trusts will be commissioning services for the prisons in their area. The commitment is clear that by 2006, all prisons will have health care commissioned by primary care trusts. I am sure that, not least because of additional investment, as well as the professionalism that is being developed, we will have better health care in general, as well as better mental health care, in our prisons as a result of the close partnership between the NHS and the Prison Service.

The Department of Health's NHS plan, which was published in 2000, included firm commitments that by 2004, the 5,000 or so prisoners who at any one time have a severe mental illness should be receiving more comprehensive mental health services in prison. If there is one matter over which I take issue with the hon. Lady, it is the description of 5,000 prisoners all needing to be in hospital. Those people with those severe mental health problems do not all need to be in hospital, any more than a member of the public with a severe mental health problem who lives at home in the community needs to be in hospital.

It is possible to provide appropriate primary and secondary care for people in the community and for those in prison, and that is what we strive to do for the 5,000 people whom we estimate have a severe mental health problem. The NHS plan also confirmed the Government's view that all prisoners with severe mental illness should be in receipt of treatment, and no prisoner with a serious mental illness would leave prison without a care plan. Indeed, there is a clear commitment within the new partnership between the NHS and the Prison Service that 300 additional staff will be employed in providing mental health services in prisons. I am pleased to confirm that we are on target to deliver on that promise, and that those 300 members of staff will be employed in our prisons.

The means by which the commitments in the NHS plan are being implemented is the prison mental health inreach project. The hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) asked me for some updates on the project, which began in 2001. Dedicated funding has been made available to provide mental health services for prisoners along similar lines to the community mental health teams that already provide mental health services in the wider community. The inreach project began at 18 establishments in England and four in Wales in 2001–02, and was extended to another 26 sites during 2002–03. This year, a total of £10 million will be spent on NHS prison inreach services in England alone, as professional teams are developed in another 46 establishments. We can see that the investment is there and that the inreach work is extending ever further throughout the Prison Service.

Resources are also being made available to tackle the more specialised mental health needs of the small number of prisoners held in close supervision centres. Between March 2004 and March 2006, I expect NHS mental health inreach investment to double so that it reaches £20 million a year by 2005–06. That means that within the next three years, the services will be available to every prison in England and Wales. The extra investment will also help many of the existing inreach teams to expand the services that they currently offer.

"Changing the Outlook" signalled the intention to establish a prison mental health collaborative to support and empower staff to modernise clinical services for prisoners with mental health problems. I am pleased to say that that collaborative action is now well under way, in partnership with the National Institute for Mental Health in England and the NHS modernisation agency. Its aim is to identify and share good practice, as well as to identify the training required as we try to modernise clinical services in our prisons. Central to that approach is the determination to empower staff, to bring about better peer group support and to improve satisfaction for service users.

There are two other developments in prison mental health care that I would like to draw to the attention of the Chamber. We know from research that prison reception screening processes were failing to identify up to three quarters of prisoners who had a severe mental illness. Several hon. Members referred to the fact that many of those people were missed at the point where they were received into prison custody. To rectify that, new triage-based reception health screening arrangements have been developed and successfully piloted. They focus on identifying and managing a prisoner's needs on first reception into prison custody. That work has been closely linked to the development of the Prison Service's suicide prevention strategy. Much comment has been made and many questions have been asked about that this afternoon, and I will return to the subject in a short while.

Four of the reception screening pilots form part of the Prison Service's "Safer Locals" programme, and as a result there has already been a substantial improvement in the identification of prisoners with severe mental illness. I am pleased to confirm that that new approach to reception health screening is now being phased in at all local prisons, in a programme that will be completed this year.

We remain firmly attached to the principle that prisoners who need in-patient treatment for their mental disorders should be transferred to hospital as soon as possible. The number of prisoners transferred to hospital as restricted patients under sections 47 and 48 of the Mental Health Act 1983 rose from 180 in 1987 to 785 in 1994. It then remained relatively stable, at an average of 745 each year, until 1999. In 2001, 635 prisoners were transferred to hospital. In 2002, the latest year for which we have figures, the number was 639.

Generally speaking, the arrangements for assessment and transfer work smoothly, and many mentally disordered prisoners can be transferred to hospital quite quickly. I was pleased that the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole made a positive comment about that. Increasingly, we are able to identify and move people on more rapidly than we used to. I am the first to accept that delays still occur in individual cases. Some prisoners have to wait longer than we would ideally like before they can be transferred to hospital. At any one time, there are likely to be about 40 prisoners who have been waiting for three months before being transferred to an NHS hospital. We appreciate that such delays can be enormously distressing for the prisoners concerned, the prisoners around them, the staff, and the prisoner's family and friends.

The prison health team and NHS regional commissioners of forensic mental health services have examined ways to reduce the time that prisoners might have to wait for a hospital place. Tighter regular monitoring has been introduced, together with a protocol that sets out the actions required of the Prison Service and the NHS when a prisoner reaches that three-month deadline. I emphasise that it is a three-month deadline, not a target. As I said, at any one time there could be 40 people who have reached that deadline. When someone reaches it, everything is done to ensure that they are moved as quickly as possible.

Following the publication of "Changing the Outlook", all prisons, in collaboration with their local NHS partners, undertook a detailed review of their mental health needs and developed action plans to fill any gaps in services that they identified. We do not underestimate the challenge—indeed, no participant in the debate has underestimated the challenge that we face, but we confidently expect that in the next three years or so there will be further progress. For example, fewer mentally disordered prisoners will be accommodated in prison health care centres, more resources will be deployed to provide day care and support on prison wings, and there will be a reduction in the average time that mentally disordered prisoners spend in the remaining prison health care beds. There will also be a more appropriate skill mix among those who provide mental health services in prisons, and quicker and more effective arrangements for transferring the most seriously ill prisoners to appropriate NHS hospitals and transferring them back when appropriate. I expect ever closer collaboration with NHS staff in the management of prisoners who are seriously mentally ill, including those who may be vulnerable to suicide or self-harm while they are in prison.

Several hon. Members raised the issue of population pressures. It is true that there are more than 75,000 people in prison—75,059, to be precise. We have plans in place to ensure that we can continue to expand prison capacity; we have added 14,700 places to the prison estate in the last six years and we will add another 2,500 this calendar year. We intend to ensure that we stay ahead of the undeniable pressure in the system.

Mr. Oaten: I understand the capacity problem, but can the Minister confirm that no cells will contain three people as a result of the attempt to maximise capacity?

Paul Goggins: No cell designed for one person will accommodate three people, as was the case not so very long ago. Cells designed for two people may accommodate three people, but the days of three people in a cell designed for one are, thankfully, over.

We will not be making routine use of police cells as part of Operation Safeguard, although it may be necessary to make occasional overnight use of a police cell, as is done now if there is a lockout, and when someone is held overnight prior to being moved to another region. It is not appropriate for prisoners to be held in police cells, or for police officers' time to be tied up in looking after and supervising those prisoners. I am adamant that we will not make routine use of police cells as an extension of the prison estate.

Mrs. Gillan: Can the Minister confirm that he is moving women prisoners from the two prisons that I identified earlier? How many women prisoners are involved, and where will they be moved to?

Paul Goggins: Yes, I can confirm that there is a re-roll, as it is called, at Winchester prison, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Winchester, and at Edmunds Hill. It was a step that had to be taken in view of the rising population pressure on prisons. When there is a re-roll, staff must be informed; questions are asked and detailed discussions have to take place. I can confirm that the therapeutic community will go to the prison at Send, and we will try to maintain the momentum of that important work.

There is some good news: in June we shall open a new prison for women at Ashford, because of the projected increase in the population of women in prisons, which has risen dramatically in recent years, far outstripping the general increase in the prison population. The number of women going to prison is levelling off, which means that we can open the new prison and re-roll the existing women's prisons for men. We can therefore provide newer accommodation for women, and additional accommodation for male prisoners.

I am not running away from the fact that the prison population is under enormous pressure. I return to my previous point that we must rebalance the system so that those who need and deserve to be in prison are in prison, and those who can be dealt with and supervised in the community are in the community.

In opening the debate, the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole forcefully drew attention to the serious and interrelated issues of suicide and self-harm in prisons. Of my many responsibilities, I regard that as of the highest importance. Too many people self-harm or take their lives in prisons, and we must do everything possible to drive that number down. There were 94 self-inflicted deaths last year, and 14 of those people were women; a disproportionately higher number of women than men took their own lives. There have been 26 self-inflicted deaths so far this year, and 24 deaths have occurred in prison for other reasons. Those figures are high. Every death in custody—I am notified immediately of every one—is deeply distressing, and a tragedy for the individual and their family, no matter what they have done to end up in prison.

It is sometimes suggested that overcrowding is a direct cause of suicides and self-harm. The prison population is a related matter, but more important is the degree of movement in the system because of population pressures. People are moved around the system more quickly, and vulnerable people are more exposed to risk. That, rather than simply the numbers involved, is the problem. The prison population includes a large number of people who come into custody already struggling to cope with a wide range of problems including drug and alcohol abuse, difficult family backgrounds, histories of sexual and physical abuse, and the problems of mental ill health that we have discussed.

I have a couple of points to make in response to questions that were put to me. A question was asked about detoxification, and reference was made to the chief inspector's report on an inspection at Styal prison. I am happy to say that things have progressed substantially at Styal since that inspection. The detoxification programme is now in operation; the money was already there but the problem was in recruiting staff to run that programme. I visited the prison last July and was concerned that the detoxification programme was not up and running, but since September it has been operating. I visited again in January and was pleased to see and hear directly from the prisoners about the difference that the programme is making. Every woman who needs one is on a methadone programme, and the system is better than the previous one.

Mention was also made of the CARATs system and the staff who work on those programmes. I am sure that hon. Members visit prisons in their constituencies and elsewhere, and will be aware of the fantastic work done by CARATs workers. I was in Norwich prison last week and met some of the team. The work that they do with prisoners to try to keep them off drugs, and to follow them once they leave prison to ensure that they receive the necessary support in the community, is essential.

The role of the ombudsman was also raised in relation to Styal prison. I commissioned the ombudsman to undertake an investigation into the six deaths that occurred over 12 months at Styal to ascertain what similarities there might have been between those deaths. Stephen Shaw produced an excellent report, and has also produced one or two other reports. From 1 April, he will be responsible for investigating all deaths in custody. That is an important step because, despite the fact that there is an investigation into every death in custody, the greater independence of Stephen Shaw and his team will be invaluable. Tragic as every death in custody is, we must learn whatever lessons we can from each one.

I can confirm that last week, the women's offending reduction programme was published—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

Police Funding (Southend)

3.30 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): For some time now, I have been concerned about what many people regard as inadequate police cover in my constituency. My mind really focused on the issue when I was called to an emergency meeting of Leigh crime prevention panel by Councillor John Lamb and Councillor Gwen Horrigan. That was when I learned first hand about the seriousness of the situation.

The Minister will be armed with facts and figures to knock me down after my speech. I am under no illusion about that, because that is the way it works here—the Minister has the last word. However, regardless of how often she says that there is more money, there are more police, and so on, the people whom I represent feel that the situation is serious and needs addressing. Leaving aside the facts and figures with which her brilliant civil servants will have armed her, I hope that she will reflect on the issues that I raise.

Members of the general public are overwhelmingly against crime, as are all Members of Parliament. There is nothing remarkable about that. If there were a magic solution for stopping crime, we can imagine how much money would be available for the health service, for education, and for fighting the terrible new threat of terrorism. Before he became Prime Minister in 1997, the leader of the Labour party made great play of his slogan, "Tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime." Yet there has been a huge increase of 800,000 in instances of recorded crime, violent crime has soared, robberies and muggings have increased, and fewer than one in four crimes is detected. No doubt the Minister will have reasons for all those increases. It is interesting, however, that we were told in the 1997 Labour party manifesto—its so-called contract with the people—that more police would be on the beat, not pushing paper, and that there would be a crackdown on petty crimes and neighbourhood disorder. In the 2001 manifesto, the rhetoric changed. We were told that the Labour party would ensure that all families were safe in their communities by tackling crime and its causes, but tackling crime was no longer described as a priority, but as an ambition.

Like many others, I am absolutely fed up with gesture politics. Never a day goes by without the Home Secretary waking up with a new idea. What on earth is the point of making more and more laws if there is no one to enforce them? I was shocked and alarmed when, in response to my parliamentary questions about drug-related offences, the Home Office said that the number of defendants proceeded against for drug offences has dropped significantly since 1998, although we all know that drug abuse is rising rapidly. Furthermore, violence and robberies have more than doubled in four years.

When the only independent councillor in Southend, Councillor Martin Terry, decided to go out on a night patrol with the chief superintendent, he came back with some shocking facts and figures. The class A drug culture in Southend is not being dealt with owing to the lack of police officers. I have many friends who work for police forces in various parts of the country. All hon. Members would agree that the police do a wonderful job and that they are overworked and underpaid. The Government should be concerned about the fact that a great age gap has developed, because, for all sorts of reasons, too many older and more experienced policewomen and men take early retirement. Nice though it is to see young officers on the streets, there is a great need for more experience.

I make no complaint about the way in which motorists are treated. No one can complain about lack of enforcement of motoring laws—there are many speed cameras and traps and armies of officers detecting whether people have paid their car tax. However, the Minister will understand why the general public think it unfair that if they do something wrong as a motorist, they will be caught, but if they are burgled, attacked or have noisy neighbours, the situation will be somewhat different.

I recently spoke to Mr. and Mrs. Hawkins, who established the south Westcliff community group. They identified a number of problems in the constituency. Elsmere hotel has had to install closed circuit television cameras because youths are walking in from the street and helping themselves to property. Many residents are concerned about their safety around Westcliff station in the evening, but they sometimes have great difficulty in getting through to Southend police station unless they dial 999. Some people have waited more than 15 minutes to report a crime and given up on trying to get through. The Minister will have heard such complaints before. That must have something to do with the financial settlement for Southend—perhaps the amount of money that is allocated to our call centres. One of our local retail proprietors has had to put up with antisocial behaviour by youths. Recently, he reported that a group of five young people were drunk outside his shop; the police eventually came to see him three days later. That, too, must be something to do with funding. A common theme is emerging.

A local entrepreneur called Con Donovan runs the Choice discount store, which sells what are euphemistically called rejects of the Next retail outlet. Every customer needs a plastic carrier bag in which to take away their goods, and he decided to print on the bottom of his bags, "We support Crimestoppers" and a telephone number. That is a simple thing to do, and I am sure that the Minister would like to encourage similar activities.

All the community organisations with which I am in contact tell me that when they raise funding concerns, the police say that a lot of money is spent on CCTV. The feeling locally is that although CCTV is essential, it is not a sole deterrent. Funding a more visible police presence is the only way to deter the most hardened criminals.

I recently spoke to a local cab driver who told me that when a sum of money became available, the police issued cab drivers with a pager so that they could act as the eyes and ears of the local police. That appeared to be a good initiative—it had the support of the town's Cab Drivers Association—but drivers discovered that when they reported incidents, police assistance sometimes took up to 45 minutes to arrive. The initiative has now been abandoned.

When Councillor Martin Terry went out on his night patrol with the local chief superintendent to see what was going on, the funding situation was confirmed.

There is a long-held view that the police are mainly concentrated in Southend town centre. It is good to have police in town centres, but that is not necessarily the case in my constituency. The residents of Leigh-on-Sea and Eastwood say that they suffer huge neglect, particularly on Friday and Saturday evenings. The councillor wrote to me to say:

"When the Police are telephoned residents are often told that there is not anyone available and the Police have to prioritise resources."

Having experienced that on several occasions—which is worrying, given the increase in violent crime and class A drugs—he believes that some police stations have been downgraded. Leigh police station is now closed in the evening, Westcliff police station has been shut completely, and Eastwood police station is open only very infrequently. On Fridays and Saturdays, the police have to deal with 10,000 to 15,000 revellers coming into Southend from London and other parts of the area.

The Leigh Times has highlighted our local traders' concerns about funding—for example, Sue Jeffs, who runs Vanilla hairdressers, is particularly worried about crime levels in Leigh—and the Yellow Advertiser is doing all that it can to enter into the spirit of the Government's efforts to combat crime. The community wants to unite against what is unfortunately happening in the town, but people feel that we need more money.

The 2001 census data have been used as evidence that funding is satisfactory, but that model is flawed. It uses specific socio-demographic figures as the basis for estimating likely criminal activity, but the people concerned did not fill in the census forms. The Minister may not be aware of that matter, but we are pursuing it with various Government Departments.

I end with a plea. The Select Committee on Health, of which I am a member, is studying obesity. We recently visited Odense, where we were given a presentation in which we were told that the city has a successful car-free policy because nearly everyone rides bikes, especially the police. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and I were surprised about that, but Labour members of the Committee told us that it is happening in some parts of this country. It is certainly not happening in Essex. Last month, I wrote to the chief constable in the hope that he might consider adopting that policy in future.

The trouble is that cash is tight because of the terrible threat that we face from terrorism. I wish that we had an answer to that, but it is difficult for this or any Government to tackle the problem of terrorists who are prepared to take their own lives. If the general public saw more policewomen and men on bikes, as well as in cars, their support might help us in our fight against crime.

The Minister and I are united in our wish to defeat the criminals. Please, please, please can we have a little bit more financial help in Southend, West?

3.45 pm

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I am delighted to congratulate the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on securing this debate, which has given us a good chance to air some issues of local concern that also have a national impact. I am more than happy to give him the undertaking that he seeks. I will reflect on some of the matters that he raised. I will do so if he will get things in perspective.

I should like to lay out the funding situation nationally and, more relevantly, for Essex, in order to highlight some of the good practice in the county not just in the police but in crime reduction and prevention. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the role of his local councillors in that partnership, which is key to building safer communities. I should also like to highlight the work that we are doing on antisocial behaviour—those low-level issues that make people's lives a misery—which has not always been fully reflected in some of the national priorities, but is beginning to be so. I should like to give him some hope and optimism.

I am inevitably going to say to the hon. Gentleman that this Government are delivering on the various manifesto pledges that they made in 1997 and 2001. Since 1997, crime generally has fallen by about 25 per cent., burglary is down by 39 per cent., vehicle crime is down by 30 per cent., and robbery is down by 17 per cent. in the last year. Those are fully validated statistics. The hon. Gentleman has a point that, despite the fact that crime has decreased dramatically over the past six years, any polling reveals that two thirds of the public feel that crime is still increasing in their area. That is a serious issue, which I call the perception gap—the gap between reality and how people feel, either at home or in their working and social lives. One main reason for that gap is the antisocial behaviour in many of our communities. If people do not feel safe when they open their front door and walk down the street—when they see graffiti, fly-tipping and fly posting, broken bus shelters and groups of youths hanging about—and things are not addressed by the authorities, they do not have any sense that their community is safer.

I have a vested interest in trying to ensure that we tackle what have been called low-level incidents, but which I think are important to people. That is why we passed the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003; why the Home Secretary, the Prime Minister and I launched the antisocial behaviour action plan in November; and why we have taken a different approach to the legislation—instead of as normal passing an Act, issuing a circular and a bit of guidance and perhaps leaving it at that. We knew that if we introduced a new range of powers, we would need to follow them up.

As well as the action plan, we have launched the "Together" campaign, which is trying to unite the police, local authorities and local businesses. I am delighted by the hon. Gentleman's example of the local entrepreneur and the Crimestoppers carrier bag. That is an excellent idea. Businesses have often been the empty seat at the table of partnerships. We must work harder to engage them. Local residents must also take action in the "Together" campaign.

We now have what we call the Together academy, which is a big training programme for all those involved on how to use the powers available. It is pointless the Government putting such powers on the statute book unless everybody is confident about how to use antisocial behaviour orders, acceptable behaviour contracts, the new housing powers, parenting orders, and powers for schools to get involved in combating truancy. The academy has been launched throughout the country. There will be an event near the hon. Gentleman, which his local workers can attend. It will provide free training by expert practitioners. Instead of there being a top-down approach, the academy has people who work on such issues day to day.

We have just launched an action line so that people can get help at the end of a telephone if they have a crack house nearby. I know that there is an increasing problem of crack cocaine in Southend. I understand that there has been a big tactical operation and that some 30 arrests of crack dealers have been made in recent weeks. We now have new powers to close crack houses. They were first used in Eastbourne—down on the south coast. I was delighted about that; I expected the first place to be Hackney, but Eastbourne was ahead of the game. I hope that the new powers will be useful.

The hon. Gentleman will know that details of the police funding settlement were finalised on 5 February. We had a full debate on it in the House. I met various people from police authorities. I received written representations from Essex Members, which were taken into account when determining the settlement. Overall, we are providing grant that supports police spending of £10.1 billion for the coming year—an increase of £400 million, or 4.2 per cent. That builds on a £2.3 billion increase since 2000.

Resources provided for the police have gone up by about 30 per cent.—17 per cent. in real terms. That is a significant real-terms investment in the police. We now have record numbers of police officers—138,386 at the last count, as far as I can remember. Moreover, some 3,243 community support officers now patrol the streets full time, giving a high-visibility uniform presence, which, as the hon. Gentleman says, is what local people increasingly want to see in their communities.

Essex has also benefited from those extra police officers. There are 149 more police officers than in March 1997, and 483 extra staff doing some of the administrative tasks, freeing up the police to do much more work on the front line. There are 91 community support officers. I am delighted that Southend council has volunteered to part-fund some of the community support officers because it sees the value of their patrolling shopping areas and estates, and assuring people. We are encouraging other areas to take a similar attitude. So, well done Southend council for coming up with some of the match funding.

Essex also has 371 special constables. I am keen to encourage more people to volunteer to become members of the special constabulary. Local people do a fantastic job on neighbourhood watch, on home watch and increasingly on pub watch, farm watch and all kinds of volunteer activity. If we can get them to take that extra step and give us four hours a week of their time, we will give them excellent training. They will have full police powers and will make a real contribution to the community.

Essex has done extremely well this year in the funding that it has received compared with other forces. We had a pretty tight settlement and so we decided, exceptionally, to provide a 3.25 per cent. increase across the board. So, we did not apply the formula this year. The hon. Gentleman said that he takes issue with the way in which the formula is calculated. He is in a minority because the formula has been subject to agreement by the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Association of Police Authorities and the Home Office. So, all the parties have been brought into the process.

The formula is pretty complex. It seeks to recognise not just socio-economic factors, but the number of temporary visitors to a place. It therefore takes tourists and temporary residents into account. It is supposed to direct funds to the areas of greatest need. We did not apply it this year because we did not have a huge amount to spend and we wanted to ensure that everyone got a settlement above inflation to meet the pay claims and other pressures in the system. If we had applied the formula to the Essex police force, it would have received £15 million less than it did. In comparison with some of the large metropolitan forces, the hon. Gentleman might feel that his force has been generously treated.

The Metropolitan police in London made a net contribution of £56 million, because we did not apply the formula; it has put £56 million back into the pot to support forces such as the hon. Gentleman's. The West Midlands police put nearly £27 million back into the pot, and so it feels very hard done by. My police force up in Greater Manchester put £6 million back into the pot to ensure that forces such as the hon. Gentleman's did not fall below the floor in the police formula settlement.

The hon. Gentleman should recognise that Essex has had a fairly generous settlement this year. As well as its general grant, it has received a range of specific grants: £6 million from the crime fighting fund, £500,000 from the rural policing fund, nearly £500,000 for the Airwave radio system and £1 million of basic command unit funding—£125,000 of that specifically for Southend. It also benefits from £2.5 million of south-east allowance payments, which recognise that police officers in the south-east have problems meeting high housing charges and that there are retention issues. We have tried to address that. It also receives a fair amount of capital provision; this year there has been a premises improvement programme to provide better facilities for vulnerable witnesses in the area, making sure that they can be interviewed in private and with dignity.

I am also aware that this year the police precept increase in Essex was 6.7 per cent.—the second lowest percentage increase in police precept across England and Wales, and equal to an extra 12p per week. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, as the local MP, and his constituents feel that paying for extra police officers and the community support officers and crime prevention measures is worth an extra 12p per week.

The distribution of those funds in the force area is a matter for the force. It has a resource allocation model. I am told that under that model, Southend gets the absolute maximum to which it is entitled. However, if the hon. Gentleman has issues about Leigh-on-Sea and other areas not being policed, particularly at the weekend, it is for him to take them up with the local chief constable and his borough commanders.

I am well seized of the problems in the night-time economy at the moment. On Monday, I launched the alcohol harm reduction strategy, which is designed to ensure that the police use their powers to prosecute licensees who sell to under-age drinkers and people who are already drunk. We are encouraging the police to use antisocial behaviour orders, exclusion orders and the powers that they now have to close down disorderly night clubs and pubs. So, there is a big drive on enforcement.

However, the industry should also play its part. Many people make a significant amount of money from pubs and clubs. In the best partnerships—in Manchester, Cardiff, York, Leicester—the police, the local authority, licensing officers and the industry work together to try to make our night-time economy much safer. The best pubs and clubs are happy to do that; if they offer a safe night out, young people will go back week after week, enjoy themselves and contribute towards profits. So, it is a win-win for everyone.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of drugs, which are a huge driver for the acquisitive crime—the burglary, the robbery—that goes on in our society. We are massively increasing the money that we are spending on that: from £1 billion a couple of years ago to nearly £1.5 billion from next April. That has gone not just on prosecuting drug dealers, but on prevention work with young people and on getting many more of our serious drug users into drug treatment. If we can get them into treatment and break the link between drugs and crime, we should see a massive impact on the acquisitive crimes that make people's lives such a misery.

Through our criminal justice intervention programme we are using every bit of the criminal justice system to get people into treatment—from the point at which they are arrested, whether or not they are on a drug treatment order. We are also ensuring that we get them into education, training and housing afterwards. After they have given up the drugs, the big challenge is to change their lives for the long term and the future.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of pensions. He is right; they can be a drain on police authority funds. Some years there is a large spike in the number of people retiring, which puts the budget under pressure. I have just issued a consultation document that considers pensions for the future in order to establish whether there is a way to encourage people with skills to stay in the force and not simply retire after 30 years. We want to keep their skills. The document should also establish whether we can take some of the pension responsibilities to the centre, and even out the pressures on police authorities.

I hope that I have addressed many of the issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised. As I said, I will reflect on what he said, provided that he acknowledges this year's extremely good comparative funding position for Essex. I am sure that he will work with his communities to make his neighbourhoods much safer and better places.

Rail Services (Weaver Vale)

3.59 pm

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to convey my thanks to Mr. Speaker for granting me this Adjournment debate. I have been pressing for it on and off since the summer recess, when I raised with the Deputy Leader of the House some of the points that I am going to raise now.

The first part of my contribution will be about Hartford railway station, which is on the west coast main line in the southern part of my constituency. There is often a misunderstanding: Hartford might be a village, but the station in fact serves a large catchment area of about 120,000 in Vale Royal as well as the Kelsall district of Chester and the Knutsford area of Macclesfield. It prospered until 2001. It had been an integral part of British Rail's west coast main line services, and in the late 1980s services were expanded from Hartford. There seemed to be a great opportunity for the railway station to do well and serve my constituents.

In the aftermath of the Hatfield crash, Virgin Rail had to consider the services that it provided, and in October 2000 it suspended services on the west coast main line from Hartford station. In May 2001, those services were stopped altogether. The reasons and mitigating circumstances cited by Virgin Rail were extraordinary. It said that it had to speed up train services from Liverpool and Preston to London and to increase track capacity to allow extra trains to run. The company also cited poor passenger figures for the west coast main line from Hartford—only 60 passengers a day. For me, that is a reasonable number of passengers using such a service, and it is a poor excuse for removing the services altogether.

There was a considerable campaign to get Virgin Rail to change its mind, but it steadfastly refused. The company has now said that it is investing £2 billion in the upgrading of services on the west coast main line and introducing Pendolino trains, which can run at 140 mph although they may run at 125 mph on that line. Virgin Rail has also said that when services improve and journey times from the north-west to London are reduced, it would be wrong to reinstate the services from Hartford because that would increase running times. When the line is upgraded, the company will miss a real opportunity to increase the number of passengers travelling on its services, and it is a shame that it is being so pig-headed about the decision, which it took it in the face of strong local opposition.

Another mitigating circumstance cited by Virgin Rail was the fact that people could use Hartford station to travel to Crewe, where they could board the west coast main line services to London, and that because there was a good local connection, that would be a good service. Virgin Rail also made the fair point that people travelling from Hartford to Crewe do so at no extra cost to those on the west coast main line services from Crewe to London.

That argument would have had more power if Virgin Rail had not stopped its local services from Hartford to Crewe in 2002. If commuters want to travel from Hartford via Crewe and arrive in London before 9 o'clock, they have to drive to Crewe station because there is not a connecting service that allows them to board a train early enough. As such, my constituents and other commuters using the service now have either to pay the cost of leaving their car at Crewe, which is £5 an hour, or to take the alternative route of going to Manchester airport and flying. We need to look again at that service.

When the services changed, I wondered why passenger service requirements had not insisted that Hartford station was kept on the west coast main line route to London. The service had existed under British Rail and at the point of privatisation, and the passenger service requirements demand that services are maintained at the pre-privatisation levels. For some reason, the previous Administration—I do not blame my hon. Friend the Minister for this—decided not to include Hartford station in those requirements. If they had, I might not have been here this afternoon complaining about the activities of Virgin West Coast since privatisation.

One of the other improvements to which I draw my hon. Friend the Minister's attention is the service from Crewe to Hartford in the evening. The service from Hartford to Crewe in the morning is poor. As I said, there is no way to connect to the west coast main line service in order to arrive in London before 9 o'clock. We have a similar problem in the evening. If commuters coming back from London to Crewe arrive after 19.47, they have to wait two hours for a connecting service to Hartford. I have been pressing the Strategic Rail Authority and the rail service providers in the area to stop the Crewe to Winsford service at Hartford at half-past 8. I am pleased to say that that has now been agreed. That is a welcome improvement to the service, but we still need to look more closely at the services provided at Hartford station.

I pressed the SRA on its involvement in the matter, because I was under the impression that its job is to ensure that our railway systems serve the public, and that it follows the Government's view that we should try to get more people out of their cars and on to public transport. Its reason for the reduction of services at Hartford is a logistical one: it claims that there is a pinch point on the line between Crewe and Weaver junction, as there is only a double track along that section of the line. That is not accurate. It is, however, accurate to say that the 5-mile track around Hartford is double track. I have asked the SRA to insist that, as part of the west coast main line improvement, that section of track is improved, so that the pinch point is removed, allowing more and faster services on the line. Sadly, it has been unable to do that on what it calls "economic grounds".

The irony of all that—I draw my hon. Friend's attention to this particular problem—is that we are currently upgrading the west coast main line and introducing a new electricity supply at 400 kV. A network of substations and trackside feeder stations is being introduced along the whole west coast main line. The substation and feeder station in our area should be near Crewe. The national grid and Network Rail have been unable to find a site in the Crewe area, and have come up with a site in Weaverham in my constituency, adjacent to the west coast main line. It will be a massive development. What the national grid did not tell people during consultations was that the development will be the size of three rugby pitches. It will be slap-bang in the middle of green belt, and will be a blot on the landscape.

The supreme irony of that is not lost on my constituents. Although we can no longer use the west coast main line services from Hartford, the improvements to the electricity supply, which will speed up the trains going from the north-west to London and vice versa, will be bang in the middle of our green belt. I am not opposed to the upgrading of the electricity supply to the west coast main line, but I am absolutely opposed to this location for the so-called substation and trackside feeder station. I believe that there are alternatives in the area, which the national grid has so far failed to explore.

Another service that Hartford might benefit from is that from Liverpool to Birmingham. I am delighted with the news that from September there will be a fast service travelling every hour. I have heard various accounts of whether that will stop at Hartford. I understand that the fast Liverpool to Birmingham train will stop there at peak times, but may not stop there off peak. If it can stop at peak times, there is absolutely no reason why it cannot stop there off peak. If my hon. Friend cannot give me an answer to that question this afternoon, we will have to see whether we can persuade the people providing the service that, if it is feasible to stop at peak times, it should be feasible to stop off peak.

There will also be a twice-hourly Liverpool to Crewe service. The passenger service requirement means that, in the gap between 17.00 and 18.00, there should be two services from Liverpool, Lime Street to Hartford. Currently, there is only one service. The SRA has allowed the railway operator to breach the passenger service requirement, and revised it in January. That again was a retrograde step. If the new trains are to travel from Liverpool to Crewe and can stop at Hartford, we may be bringing services closer to what they were before privatisation. The other good news is that, in 2005, there will be a Birmingham to Preston train. Will the Minister confirm that that will stop at Hartford, too? If so, gradual improvements will be made to the station that was once probably the jewel in the crown of rail services in the north-west.

I wish to raise with my hon. Friend the 7.09 service from Hartford to Stansted airport. It is run by Central Trains and is an absolute disgrace. It is often late and it is frequently cancelled. I am told that the rolling stock is old and dirty and that the travelling public are not receiving good value for their money. Several constituents have raised the matter with me. The operating record of Central Trains is not good. As a regional operator, its performance is the worst in the league table and it is third worst in overall performance. That is epitomised by the 7.09 service from Hartford station. It needs to be improved.

Perhaps we can take a leaf out of the book of the Midland Mainline service, which I understand from today's Ceefax has a novel way to improve train punctuality. It has issued its guards with ACME thunderer whistles. The guards blow the whistles and that chivvies up the passengers to get on the trains more quickly, as a result of which the trains run on time. If that is all it takes to improve train services, I recommend it to my hon. Friend as an economic way to deal with problems of Central Trains, especially the 7.09 service.

My hon. Friend is aware of the Halton Curve. It is a stretch of railway line that connects the north Cheshire railway lines with the west coast main line, linking it to north Wales, Chester, Frodsham, Helsby and directly from Runcorn to Liverpool. It is called the parliamentary line in my neck of the woods because to close a railway line there must be an Act of Parliament. That is a statutory requirement. For that line not to be closed, a light service is run. During the summer on a Saturday morning, I am told that 18 passenger services run from Chester to Runcorn and do not return. The railway line is the missing piece of the jigsaw in the north-west. It would link the west coast main line with the new Liverpool-Allerton interchange; it would provide a direct link to Liverpool John Lennon airport; and it would allow freight coming in from Liverpool city docks and the Mersey docks to connect at Birmingham and Felixstowe without having to go on to the west coast main line. It would open up passenger possibilities at the gateway of Chester into north Wales and it would link up the gateway of Warrington into Blackpool and into the north-west.

Several of us are pressing my hon. Friend the Minister for such a measure to be included either in the west coast main line upgrade or for it to have discrete funds of its own to make improvements. Furthermore, a consortium could come forward involving the North West Development Agency, which supports the plan; Cheshire county council, which supports the plan; Halton borough council, which supports the plan; the chambers of trade and commerce in Liverpool, and a range of other organisations that believe that such action should be taken. We must not miss such an opportunity. It would be beneficial for the local economy and for the economy in the north-west. It would have an impact. We must remember that Liverpool will celebrate being the European capital of culture in 2008, and that all such matters will be important.

I want to end on a positive note. Two issues are acutely important in my constituency; one concerns a major boost to transport investment in Cheshire. It will cover a large part of my constituency with the exception of Halton borough council, which is a unitary council in the north of the constituency. The Department for Transport has awarded Cheshire county council an extra £26 million of funds for its local transport planning strategy for 2004–05. The county council welcomes that as a major boost to transport investment in the county. Slightly more than £12 million will go into maintenance activities, more than £10 million will be used take forward the county council's integrated transport programmes, and other money will be available for allocation to supplementary bids throughout the year. That is exceptionally good news for my constituents and is good news for council tax payers in the Cheshire county council area.

However, I contrast that with the absurd decision taken by the county council to cut its subsidised bus services after 7 o'clock in the evening. The cuts have taken place across the board, and the council is also considering cutting school transport services. Those are retrograde steps, which will mean that more people will use their cars, congesting our roads and making our environment more unsafe and polluted. Cheshire county council, with the extra cash that it was given by the Government, could have been a little more adventurous in the way it approached its transport policy.

Finally, I want to raise the question of Helsby station, which is on the Ellesmere Port to Helsby route into Manchester, and has recently received the best-kept station award. It is a magnificent listed building, and the local community has done a fabulous amount of work to make it a credit to and a jewel in the crown of our area. I want to place on record my thanks to the people involved in that project and to say what a wonderful job they have done. It is an example of what could be done with stations throughout the UK. My hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) used that rail service on Saturday to go to Manchester; the service ran on time and the trains were clean. He said that it was a joy to travel on it. I give that example to show that I am not just being critical of our rail services; some things in my constituency work well.

During the time that I have represented Weaver Vale, I have been ably assisted by the North Cheshire rail users group and the Mid-Cheshire rail users group. Both groups have been a fantastic source of information and encouragement. I give particular thanks to Andrew MacFarlane from the Mid-Cheshire rail users group and to Ian Watson, who is no longer with the North Cheshire rail users group, but who put a fabulous amount of work into that activity. I also thank Mr. Frank Thomas, who has been one of the leading lights with respect to the best-kept station at Helsby, which is in my constituency.

I hope that I have left enough time for the Minister to respond to the points that I have made, but I shall sum up those points briefly. I am concerned about the diminution of west coast main line services at Hartford. I am also concerned about the diminution of cross-country services and local services, and emphasise the need to recognise that Hartford has a part to play in providing decent rail services, together with Acton Bridge and the other station in Northwich, as well as Runcorn East and the Runcorn mainline services in my constituency. I hope that the Minister can respond positively to the points that I have made.

4.18 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) on securing the debate and providing an opportunity to discuss rail services to Weaver Vale. He made a fine speech, and represented his constituents well. He is well qualified to do so. I have been looking at various maps—I have become a bit of a rail anorak since I took on this job—and found that his constituency must have as many railway stations as any other hon. Member's. It has eight stations, served by at least four train companies, of which he mentioned two: Central and Virgin.

[Dr. Kim Howells]

My hon. Friend takes a great interest in communications across his constituency, because it requires good communications. His constituency is not a centre of big, urban populations, but it serves big, urban populations. His constituents are an integral part of several separate city work forces in the north-west of England. I shall try to deal with the points that he raised. I fully understand the importance of Hartford railway station. Hartford may not have a massive population, but it serves a large area and it is a popular station. We are encouraging companies to do what they can to improve railway stations and the rail services to and from those stations.

It might be helpful to give an update on the upgrading of the west coast main line, which is one of Europe's busiest mixed traffic railway lines. Decades of under-investment have affected the ability of current train operators—notably Virgin—to run punctual services on that route. In many respects, it was a second-rate railway, plagued with infrastructure failures and hampered by the poor reliability of the rolling stock. The situation was exacerbated by the speed restrictions imposed on the network following the terrible Hatfield derailment in October 2000.

We have made a huge investment in the west coast main line to turn around the decades of neglect. New rolling stock is being introduced on the line and the multi-billion-pound project to renew and upgrade the infrastructure is well under way. The Strategic Rail Authority's strategy, published last June, sets out how that will be achieved.

My hon. Friend asked an important question about the part of the upgrade that will improve the power supply to the west coast main line and he mentioned the proposed construction of a substation. I appreciate what he said; he is trying to represent the interests of his constituents who live in that lovely part of the world, and who face the prospect of a substation suddenly being dumped in their back yard. However, the site is at the point where the 400 kV electricity supply line crosses the railway line, which is the most convenient spot for a substation to feed the west coast main line, enabling the new trains plying that line, which need much more electricity than existing trains, to receive the upgrade.

I take my hon. Friend's point, but the substation is an essential part of the project to provide greater capacity on the line and to improve performance, and the prerequisite is to increase the power supply. The proposal is well into its planning stage and various procedures are being followed, so I can give my hon. Friend little comfort in that respect. He knows as well as I do the difficulties of trying to interfere with planning law if it has been followed reasonably accurately.

Mr. Hall: I am not asking my hon. Friend to comment on the merits of the planning application or to endorse it. I merely wanted to draw his attention to the fact that there is huge opposition to the proposal and that there is a viable alternative to the intended site.

Dr. Howells: I very much take my hon. Friend's point; he has become an expert on the issue, which I am not. However, I am afraid that he will have to take it up with the powers that be. There is little that we can do because we no longer have the levers to pull on these issues.

As time is short, I will now deal with the specific matters that my hon. Friend raised. I am fully aware from the debate and from previous correspondence to me and to the SRA of his concern about passenger services to and from Hartford. Services to be introduced from autumn 2004 are still being refined, but the current proposal is that Hartford should have an hourly service provided by the Birmingham to Liverpool route. The SRA has concluded consultation on the proposed timetables for September 2004 and is examining the results. I have a draft of the timetable, which I will be only too glad to give to my hon. Friend. It looks pretty reasonable. He also asked about the additional service from Birmingham to Preston. That service is important because Preston station is, in many ways, a gateway to services north of that point. We hope that Hartford will be part of that service, and I will try to discover more detail about it as soon as I can.

The improvements that my hon. Friend wants for Hartford cannot be introduced earlier because of limited track capacity on the west coast main line while renewal and modernisation work takes place. He has played his part, along with his constituents, in putting up with a good deal of suffering and misery on that line while the work has been undertaken. I want to reassure him that, at the end of the process, it will be one of the very best railway lines anywhere in Europe. The line will see an enormous increase in capacity, a half-hour reduction in the travelling time between Manchester and London, and commensurate reductions in travelling times between Liverpool and London, Crewe and London and so on. That will benefit many of his constituents, as well as allowing greater capacity for more local services within and around his constituency. That is a very good news story—and a very expensive story, as he knows.

Delivery of the new fleet of high-quality 100 mph electric multiple units from mid-2005, facilitating a far better regional inter-city service, should permit an improvement in services to Hartford station. My hon. Friend will welcome that good news. If he does not want the new 100 mph trains, I will have them down in Pontypridd. I am sure that we would be very glad to receive them. They will give a big boost to train services in his area.

In the few moments that I have left, I will deal with the question of the Halton Curve. My hon. Friend has raised that matter with colleagues in the past and I know that he feels strongly about it. Currently, the lightest-possible service runs around it. I understand that it is mainly for rail enthusiasts in the summer, who go, as he put it, one way around the Halton Curve. I can see his point. Interestingly, the SRA has issued a consultation paper on what it calls community railways. My hon. Friend's suggestion on the possibility of a partnership approach in the north-west was also very interesting. I am sure that people in the region will consider carefully the idea involving John Lennon airport, which could certainly benefit from a connection to the market in north Wales for flights out of that airport.

My hon. Friend is right to identify the fact that there are parcels of money that could be put together positively so that the Government and the SRA could be asked to consider doing something at some future time with stretches of railway line such as the Halton Curve, so that they can provide new services that benefit everyone. I cannot give him an undertaking that we have the money in place to do something with the Halton Curve right now, because we have not, but I can guarantee that the Halton Curve track will be protected to ensure that people do not develop on it and render it incapable—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order.

It being half-past Four o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 18 March 2004

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

The Scientific Response to Terrorism

[Relevant documents: Eighth Report from the Science and Technology Committee, Session 2002–03, HC 415-I, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6108.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Charlotte Atkins.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): I call the Chairman of that important Committee, who is a distinguished Member of the House, Dr. Ian Gibson.

2.30 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—you flatter me. I am pleased to deliver the report and to introduce today's debate. Although this is an important subject, the debate is not unique. For many years we have talked about science and its role in defending the state and the world against terrorist acts. We did so in the late 1960s, particularly in relation to events in Ireland and so on—the British Society for Responsibility in Science examined events in Northern Ireland and how to allay some effects of the acts that went on there. Such consideration continues today.

It is appropriate that we are having this debate today, in the wake of the atrocities in Madrid. We offer our great respect to the people there, who have stood up with great dignity and said that enough is enough. We associate ourselves with them—not only those in the scientific community, but the whole community in Spain who have suffered that atrocity. We believe that a similar event may happen here—indeed, many people in this part of the world probably thought that it had happened this morning, when Parliament square was closed off. Thankfully, the cause was a spillage from a chemical container after a crash, but it could have been the type of event that we all dread.

That is the spirit in which the Committee entered into our deliberations and investigations. It was a spirited inquiry. We examined how counter-measures against biological, chemical and radiological terrorism are informed by science and technology; how the surveillance of dangerous chemicals and pathogens is co-ordinated nationally and internationally; the policies that we have here and internationally to respond; the public communications policy on such threats and on the responses to biological, chemical and radiological terrorism; the relevant research being undertaken in the UK and the controls that we place on that; and the need for an ethical code of conduct for scientists working with pathogens and chemical substances.

I am pleased that we have the opportunity today to discuss the report. Yesterday, in an astronomically superb Budget, science was mentioned—perhaps more times than I have had hot dinners in a month—not only in terms of its relationship to terrorism, but in terms of improving health, understanding of climate change and so on. I am proud to be associated with our Government's putting money into such fields. Of course, terrorism was also mentioned, so our debate is very apt.

We recognise that we now live in a dangerous world. The attacks in Washington, Bali and, of course, New York have heightened our resistance to such events. Terrorism is not merely about suicide bombers, or planes crashing into twin towers; it is now about individuals' propensity to release white powders. White powders were released last weekend, and good science was required to identify whether they were talcum powder or anthrax spores. In the aftermath of New York, panic was created in that city and in Washington by the release of suspect packages. The postal services in this very place were actively looking at the possibilities. At one end of the scale are pranksters; at the other are serious terrorists who are trying to impose their ways and ideals on the world. I always think that that is a vicious, nasty way to get one's political views over—it affects defenceless people. We have to take every possibility seriously and try to make sure that nothing gets past our surveillance systems. We can never claim to be 100 per cent. perfect, but we can be 80 or 90 per cent. sure that we are pulling out all our stops against terrorism and such a use of science.

I often wonder how to define terrorism, given how the word has been used. The literature that I have received from the Halifax, where I have an account, defines it brilliantly. Insurance companies and building societies have had it right for a long time, but I bet that few right hon. and hon. Members have looked at their building society policy to see how such institutions define terrorism. The Halifax defines it as "the use, or threat of use, of biological, chemical and/or nuclear force or contamination by any person(s), whether acting alone or on behalf of or in connection with any organisation(s) or government(s), committed for political, religious, ideological or similar purposes including the intention to influence any government(s) or put any section of the public in fear."

Gosh—that definition covers everything. It makes us sit up and think that such institutions have been thinking it through. Hopefully, we can relate to that attitude and see the whole fight against terrorism in those terms.

Before discussing the inquiry, I must thank the Committee Clerks, whose brilliance is often exposed by our Committee, through Radio 4 and letters to Ministers. They keep us in check—by gosh, that is sometimes a hard job, but they do it brilliantly—and I thank them for that. I also thank the people who have hosted us, such as the Home Office officials who steered us through difficult waters, and the British embassy in Washington and the consulates-general in Atlanta and San Francisco, who hosted the Committee on its annual visit to the United States, which was very useful. I must also thank our well known and distinguished specialist advisers: Professor Roy Anderson of Imperial college; Professor Alastair Hay of Leeds university, who was, of course, strongly associated with the David Kelly inquiry; Professor Bill Keevil from Southampton university; and Professor Michael Elves, who used to work for Glaxo Wellcome. They helped us in our inquiries, and tailored and supported us in our questioning.

[Dr. Ian Gibson]

Although many issues should be highlighted, today I shall address three main points in the report, the first of which is openness and security. I do not do so vindictively; I simply want to question how Select Committees, through our inquiries, are able to obtain information to inform and instruct us, thus allowing us to feel as though we are making a responsible, well researched response to the cases being examined. Another job of mine is to sit on the Liaison Committee with the Chairmen of other Select Committees. A few hours ago, the Foreign Affairs Committee's first special report on the decision to go to war in Iraq was published. It identifies many of the same problems of openness and security that our Committee faced, although I shall not go into all the instances detailed in the report.

I believe that the issue will be raised on the Floor of the House, and might be resolved there. How is the judgment made on whether individuals are to be allowed to go before a Select Committee to give information and to answer questions honestly? How is that balanced against their role of protecting the state, the nation, the realm and so on, which means that they cannot give information that might be highly secret and might be given to the enemy or terrorists? That is an extremely difficult balance to strike, and no one has a perfect solution, but we learn by experience. As the Chairman of the Committee, I was engaged in many back-room conversations with all sorts of people who are high up in the Government about getting hold of information, and I often found that things that seemed to be secret were not. Quite a lot of them were on websites. Even the high-ups in Government do not always know exactly what is out there. Perhaps we should address that.

Talking to people behind the scenes resolved a lot of misunderstandings. For instance, some people thought that we were out of order for conducting the inquiry. We made it clear that we were looking at the use of science and technologies in the war against terrorism. We did not want to know the dreadful secrets—who knew what and when, and who said what to whom. We wanted to know what was going to happen, who made the decisions, and whether decisions on new areas of endeavour would be made. After discussion, those matters were resolved—it took a bit of hammering out, but we got there in the end, and I am grateful for that.
